Palestinian-Canadian convicted in Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Gaza-born Canadian citizen pleaded guilty last week to planning attacks on Israelis in North America and was sentenced by a military court to four years in prison, the Israel Defence Forces said.

Jamal Akkal, 24, was arrested in Gaza on Nov. 1, 2003, and charged by the military with conspiracy to commit manslaughter. Prosecutors said Akkal planned to carry out attacks against Israeli officials travelling in the United States, as well as bombings against Jewish targets in North America.

Akkal had denied the charges, claiming a confession he gave was made under duress.

Under the plea bargain, Akkal was found guilty of conspiracy to commit manslaughter and receiving paramilitary training, the army said. He was credited with time served since his arrest, and a second charge of receiving paramilitary training was dropped. Akkal, who was also fined 2,000 shekels, had faced up to 21 years in prison, the army said.

Akkal was born and raised in the Nusseirat refugee camp in central Gaza and moved to Windsor, Ont., in 1999, where he received Canadian citizenship. He was arrested in Gaza after he fired eight shots in the air, his lawyer said.

During the trial, Akkal claimed he had gone to Gaza to get engaged. The army said he met with militants from Hamas, received weapons training and planned attacks.

According to the indictment, Akkal planned to buy an M-16 rifle in Detroit and bomb materials to carry out the attacks in cities where many Jews live.

His handlers also allegedly told Akkal to raise money in mosques in North America, ostensibly to help families of Palestinian suicide bombers but actually to fund Akkal's militant activity, the army charged.

Israel denied Canadian media reports that Akkal had been abused during interrogation. Akkal had said Hamas approached him to carry out attacks in North America, but he never agreed to do so.

The Canadian government announced that it will not contest the sentence. Canadian consular representatives were present when Akkal accepted the plea bargain. They said they will continue to offer assistance to Akkal behind bars while he serves his four-year sentence. "However, we cannot interfere in the judicial process of another country," Marie-Christine Lilkoff, a spokesperson for Foreign Affairs Canada, said last week.

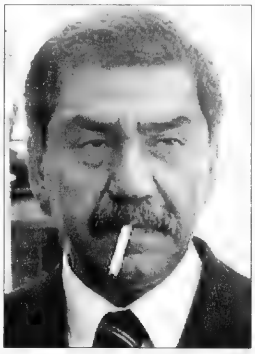
Iraqi political party seeks relations with Israel

By YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BAGHDAD — A new Iraqi political party calling for the establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel will compete in upcoming elections in Iraq.

Mithal al-Alusi, an Iraqi politician who visited Israel a few months ago, heads the new Iraqi Nation Democrat Party. According to Alusi, 1,150 people have signed the party's request to the elections committee to participate in the elections.



Mithal al-Alusi

"We are keeping Iraqi interests in sight. These interests includes strategic relations with the United States and also ties with Israel," Alusi Said.

Iraqis levelled bitter criticism at Alusi about his visit to Israel, which he made using his German passport.

Alusi was removed from his leadership position of his former political party, a warrant was put out for his arrest and he was forced to hide out in his home in the poor Shi'ite Sadr City area of Baghdad. Alusi himself is a Sunni.

Al-Hayat newspaper reported last week that the Iraqi National Congress party, under the leadership of Ahmed Chalabi, will join Alusi's new party. Alusi also said that a few men of Muqtada al-Sadr, the extremist Shi'ite leader, have joined him as well.

"The style of rule of Saddam Hussein must change in the direction of closeness with Israel," Alusi said. "The Iraqis need to deal with various Israeli companies – particularly those of the half-million Iraqis in Israel – from the standpoint of supporting peace and Iraq."

Following his visit to Israel, Alusi delivered a detailed report to the offices of Iraqi President Ghazi al-Yawer, Prime Minister Iyad Allawi and the Minister of Foreign Affairs Hoshyar Zebari. He has not yet received a response.

Poverty in Israel

The number of Israelis living below the poverty line last year stood at 1,427,000, some 22.4 per cent of the population, according to the National Insurance Institute's poverty report for 2003, released last week. The annual report also showed that more than 105,000 people fell below the poverty line last year. Projections for 2004 say the trend will likely continue.

Terror attacks thwarted

The Israel Defence Forces and Shin Bet reported last week that 33 Palestinian terrorist attacks were thwarted in the last three months.

Yad Vashem website booms

Yad Vashem's website experienced a record increase in visitors after it posted a database of Shoah victims. More than 400,000 people visited the website of Israel's Holocaust memorial in the first 24 hours after the database of 3 million victims was posted early last week, more than 10 times the number who usually visit in an entire month, Ha'aretz reported. The database is available at www.yadvashem.org.

Israeli, PA tourism

At a joint press conference last week in Jerusalem, Israeli Tourism Minister Gideon Ezra and Palestinian Minister of Tourism and Antiquities Mitri Abu Aita signed an historic joint statement pledging to co-operate to promote tourism to the area. It was the first such meeting between the two ministers in four years. In the statement, both parties undertake to "take effective measures to assure the safe and smooth passage of pilgrims and tourists visiting Israeli and Palestinian areas."

Israel limits missiles

Israel earned praise for adhering to some principles of the Missile Technology Control Regime, though it is not a member of the 34-nation group. "Israel is a good example of how countries can lead unilaterally without being members, and implementing all MTCR guidelines," said Argentine Ambassador Carlos Sersale di Cerisano, who led a visit to Israel during his tenure as MTCR chairman. The group seeks to limit the risks of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction by controlling relevant technology transfers. Sersale, who stepped down from his yearlong tenure as chairman in September, gave a briefing in Washington, D.C., last week.

Draftee motivation high

The Israeli military reported record-high motivation among draftees. According to figures released last week by the army, 92 per cent of recent inductees asked to serve in combat units, a standard gauge of morale. The army also said 96 per cent of draftees reported satisfaction at having been posted to one of their top three unit choices.

Columbia vows swift action on anti-Israel professors

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Columbia University president Lee Bollinger plans "specific steps" soon in response to allegations that professors and lecturers at the Ivy League university have made vitriolic and malicious comments against Israel in classes.

Bollinger made the pledge in a phone call last week to Anti-Defamation League national director Abraham Foxman. Bollinger didn't detail the character of the steps, but emphasized "the matter will be handled immediately.'

Columbia was recently embarrassed by reports that Middle Eastern professors are exploiting their academic standing to express extreme political views on Israel, using slanderous and defamatory statements.

The allegations against the professors, including their names and photographs, were published last week in an investigative report by the New York Daily News.

After the recent public screening of Columbia Unbecoming, a film about alleged faculty bias and bullying against Jewish students that was produced by the David Project, a pro-Israel group in Boston, one student denounced another as a "Zionist fascist scum," the Daily News reported.

In October, Columbia said it would probe the intimidation allegations and improve procedures for students to file grievances. "Is the climate hostile to free expression? I don't believe it is, but we're investigating to find out," Columbia provost Alan Brinkley told the paper.

Jewish sources in New York told Ha'aretz last week that major Jewish donors to the university were considering severing ties with the prestigious institution in response to the "corrupt behaviour" by academic staff. In particular, the sources mentioned Jewish graduates of the university active in alumni organizations.

They said Bollinger had recently received irate requests from alumni protesting the behaviour of the professors and explaining they expected an appropriate response from the university to what they called "malicious comments" against Israel.

The university president recently proposed the establishment of a special chair for Israeli studies, with the view of separating it from Middle East studies. The proposal was interpreted by the Jewish community as an appeasement gesture after the wave of protest against behaviour by professors in the Middle East studies program.

Foxman told Ha'aretz last week that his meeting with Bollinger left him with the impression that the president "is aware of the problem and understands its seriousness."

Foxman called the Columbia events "particularly grave as the institution is located in New York, which has a large Jewish population, and Jewish students are exposed to insults from professors."

Foxman emphasized that "if Columbia handles the problem decisively, it will be a strong message to other U.S. campuses where similar phenomena occur."

'No safe haven' from cyber-bullies, panel told

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Internet has created a whole new world for bullies.

They used to be limited to the schoolyard, but they can now use their computers to follow their victims home, said participants at a recent forum sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service.

"[By using their computer], kids have found a new way to bully each other," said Glen DiPasquale, chief psychologist for the York Region District School Board.

Also on the panel were social worker Joe Rich, a regular guest therapist and parenting expert on CityLine and resident therapist on Global TV's new show Last Chance for Romance; and Det.-Const. Bruce Downey of York Region Police's technological crime unit.

Rich said the oldest research available about cyber-bullying only goes back about five years. "We are still struggling to understand it. The kids are ahead of us."

The phenomenon is frightening because children "have no safe haven any more. [Hateful] messages are sent 24 hours a day. Kids can wake up to them," DiPasquale said.

"The messages are anonymous so kids' actions are consequence-free."

In the first incident recorded in York Region, some students created a website about another Grade 7 student, complete with text drawings and photos, DiPasquale said.

"Can you imagine [how the girl felt] when she went to that site? She was being humiliated in front of the whole world. At a time when kids are already sensitive, this can be traumatizing."

In another incident, a number of girls received "foul" e-mails and went to their parents, who in turn called police. "[Some girls] had made it look like these messages came from boys.

Computers are a wonderful tool, he said, "but there is great potential for harm. We need to talk to our kids about abusing them. They must see that it can be an insidious, deeply rooted problem."

Downey, who deals with crimes that involve computers, said his caseload is growing by leaps and bounds. "Cyber-bullying is plain bullying with a digital trail. It involves uttering threats and conveying false messages that are defamatory."

He advised parents to call the police immediately if they come across a cyber-bully.

"If you find yourself [or your children] being victimized, do not delete anything. We rely on a digital trail, so do not do any investigating on your own. You may delete something we require."

Police investigate cyber-bullying as if it were a face-to-face crime, Downey said, "and in most cases we can identify it back to the author."

In another bullying symposium sponsored by Associated Hebrew Schools, guest speaker Isadora Hare said that children who have been bullied are more likely than other kids to be depressed, have low self-esteem, be absent from school and think about suicide.

Parents need to be supportive, said Hare, who works in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' office of adolescent health.

"Never tell your child to ignore the bullying, and don't blame [him]... Sympathize with your child and tell [him] that you are glad he had the courage to tell you about it."

Parents are often reluctant to report bullying to school officials, but bullying probably won't stop with the help of adults at your child's school, she said.

She said parents should consider calling the police if another child has physically assaulted your child or is seriously threatening him with harm.

In the Party Planner (CJN, Nov. 18), the headline for the article on florists (page B-18), "Young brides prefer cascading brocades to hand-tied bouquet arrangements," should have read, "cascading bouquets," according to Wisteria Floral Design owner Debbie Haedecker, who was incorrectly quoted in the story. Also the caption under the picture incorrectly spelled Wisteria.

Jewish values have fostered Israeli technological innovation

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

While it's common knowledge that Israelis make great falafels, many people would be surprised to hear that Israel is a leader in Internet technology, medical research and biotechnology.

According to Alastair Gordon, director of communication for the Canadian Coalition for Democracies, Israelis have had a hand in creating everything from Internet routers, Windows XP software and instant messaging to developing CT scanners and MRI systems.

Speaking at Darchei Noam synagogue recently, Gordon said: "Other than the United States... Israel arguably creates more innovations... than any nation on the planet."

'Other than the United States... Israel arguably creates more innovations... than any nation on the planet'

The Toronto-based Gordon knows more about Israeli innovation than most people, but his appreciation for Jewish technology didn't stem from using the Israeli-made instant messaging program, ICQ.

In addition to owning a number of patents, Gordon founded and sold three companies, all in different areas of technology. One of his companies, Panacom Automation Inc., which was involved in computerized industrial automation, was sold to Hewlett-Packard.

Gordon, who isn't Jewish, says his admiration for Israeli technology came from working with Israelis while running his companies.

"I have founded and divested three technology companies, and in all cases I benefited from innovations developed in Israel," he says. "It didn't seem to matter what technology I was working with... there was always an Israeli connection."

'If you look inside your computer, you will likely see 'Made in Israel' on the central processing unit'

Gordon soon began to wonder why such a small country was so productive. The reason, he says, has to with values. "The values being passed down in Jewish society are human decency, tolerance, self-sufficiency, contribution to society, personal responsibility and education." All of which, he adds, creates a climate for innovation.

Gordon says technologies that Israelis have helped create include the Pentium 4 microprocessor; 3D face recognition, which is currently found in many airports; radiation-free diagnostic instrumentation for breast cancer; and new acne treatments.

If Israel's detractors knew about the county's innovations, he asked, would they be so quick to criticize Israel?

"If you look inside your computer, you will likely see 'Made in Israel' on the central processing unit," says Gordon. "I wonder if the devoutly anti-Israel clergy and their Harvard brethren will give up their precious computers from which they broadcast e-mails demonizing Israel."

Another major 20th-century innovation that Israelis helped to develop was the cellphone.

"The cellphone was invented by Motorola Israel," says Gordon. "Even though Motorola is based in the U.S., its biggest research facility is in Israel. That proves that either Motorola are a pack of Zionists or that Israelis are very smart and creative. Why do I suspect the latter?"

Despite all the contributions Israel has made to the world, the average person is unaware of the country's achievements, something Gordon chalks up to bad public relations.

Israel's innovations prove that not only is the country creative, he says, but it also shows how its values are different from Palestinian values.

Gordon took issue with a blurb on CBC's website that said, "Classrooms in Israel and Palestine breed enough fear and hatred to make sure there will be war there for generations." He says everything Israel has done to benefit the world verifies that it's the Palestinians who are preaching hate, not the Israelis.

"The fact that innovation and contribution for the past 50 years resulting from Palestinian education has been precisely zilch, while the Israeli education system has yielded unprecedented innovations, puts a lie to CBC's crude attempt at selling moral equivalency between Palestinian and Israeli education.

"The behaviour and innovation of Israelis and Palestinians is proof positive that only one side is preaching hate."

Harold Green tried 'to make world better'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Harold Green, who was prominent in the worlds of both real estate and philanthropy, died on Nov. 18. He was 78.

The Toronto-born and raised Green was chair of Verdiroc Development Corporation and principal of Greenwin Property Management Inc.

Beginning as a bricklayer, he later joined the Greenwin Construction Company established by his father, the noted builder Lipa Green, and Arthur Weinstock. In 1978, together with his three sons, Eric, Cary and Kevin, he started Verdiroc, which builds residential, commercial and institutional developments across Canada.

A company press release says he was among the first to embrace the concept of mass-produced housing components, as well as a new system of construction called the flying form.

He believed strongly in the importance of maintaining good relationships between management and labour. In 1967, he founded and was the first president of the Metro Toronto Apartment Builder's Association, which forged the first collective agreement between workers, employers and the unions, and established medical, dental and legal aid benefits and a pension plan for construction workers.

He also established the Local 183 Training Centre, which helped in retraining construction workers.

In 1998, he was inducted into the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association Hall of Fame.

Green used his expertise in building to help as a board member, construction advisor and consultant for the expansion to Mount Sinai Hospital and the various Jewish Community Centres, and for the Lipa Green Building.

Harold Green

He was also active in United Jewish Appeal, and, especially, the Canada Israel Children's' Centres, whose 14 centres in Israel offer children training and opportunities in tennis, as well as various other social services.

This was partly because of his own interest in tennis, which he played extensively. He was also interested in gardening and being a "devoted and proactive parent and grandparent and family member," as his son Cary said.

Cary Green, who considers himself "blessed and privileged to be Harold Green's son," described his father as "a mensch, in the purest sense of that term. He spent every day planning how to make the world better. He lived fully and meaningfully. There were no idle or wasted moments – his goal was to contribute."

His father was modest and down to earth, he said, adding simply, "He was good to people."

Harold Green is survived by Miriam, his wife of nearly 52 years; children Eric, Cary and his wife Rhonda, Kevin and his wife Lisa, and Robin; brothers Al and Sammy; sisters Dina, Ruchie and Shavey; 10 grandchildren, 23 nieces and nephews, and many great-nieces and great-nephews.

Former Israeli army chief drowns

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Rafael Eitan died the way he lived, facing the storm alone.

After Eitan drowned last Tuesday while braving winter squalls to inspect a pier he built off Ashdod port, friends and colleagues voiced no surprise at the fate of the 75-year-old former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff.

"He always said he wanted to die on the battlefield, so I guess, in a way, he got his wish," lawmaker Nehama Ronen told Army Radio.

Nicknamed "Raful" and rarely seen without his trademark kibbutz cap, Eitan was for many Israelis the image of the old sabra – always ready to match tough talk with action.

"His life's story is characterized by a warm and courageous bond to the land. He recognized that we have to fight in order to defend the existence of the State of Israel," Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said in a statement.

But Eitan was forced to end his military career after he was reprimanded following the 1982 massacre of Palestinian refugees by an Israeli-allied Christian militia in the Sabra and Shatila camps outside Beirut.

Born in Moshav Tel Adashim in 1929, Eitan as a boy led reprisal raids against marauding Arabs. He joined the Palmach, a Jewish militia in pre-state Palestine, at age 16.

After Israel was born, he went on to serve in all its wars, leading the country's only deployment of troops by parachute, the 1956 operation against Egyptian forces in the Mitla Pass.

"He was a brave commander and a brave soldier," said Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, who served under Eitan and later became IDF chief of staff.

Rafael (Raful) Eitan

When he was chief of staff, Eitan put a premium on discipline, stamping out what he saw as the slovenliness that had crept into the ranks in the 1970s, and insisting that troops wear berets at all times. He was widely admired for innovations that allowed the IDF to retain its technological superiority over Arab foes.

Like Sharon, who stepped down as defence minister following the Sabra and Shatila massacre, Eitan bounced back as a politician.

Having formed Tehiya and Tsomet, nationalist factions opposed to ceding any land captured in the 1967 Six-Day War in peace deals, Eitan joined the coalition governments of former prime ministers Yitzhak Shamir in 1988 and Benjamin Netanyahu in 1996.

Eitan quit politics in 1999 after his party failed to win any Knesset seats in the general election, returning to work as an olive farmer, encouraging disadvantaged youths to gain professional experience during their military service and pursuing several construction projects, including the port at Ashdod.

"Raful never forgot his great love – the land and labor. Thus, to our sorrow, he met his end," Sharon said. "I lost a comrade-in-arms and a friend."

Eitan is survived by his wife, Ofra Meyerson, with whom he lived in Herzliyah, and three daughters. His two sons died under tragic circumstances – one of illness at age 10 and the other in an accident while training as an Israeli Air Force pilot.

Medical school admissions director sees hope for future

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

So, what does it take to get into medical school? And how will decisions about who to accept today affect Canada's health-care system 10 years from now?

As director of admissions at the University of Toronto medical school, Dr. Maureen Shandling probably sits in the best seat to explain a national health-care conundrum that begins with more than 10 applicants for every first-year medical school spot.

"With close to 2,100 students applying for 198 positions, the University of Toronto medical school admissions committee begins by considering mainly those students with A averages from three full-time years of university. However, the committee also understands that a doctor has to have more than just good grades in the sciences," Shandling says.

"In order to be considered, students have to have taken a couple of biology courses and a humanities. Other than that, they can pick and choose their other classes. We have people coming in from engineering, arts, music and a variety of different programs," adds the associate professor at the faculty of medicine.

The application also asks for a personal essay, a description of any volunteer activities and three references. In addition, students have to take the MCAT, a standardized exam given across North America, and they need to score in the top 40th percentile.

Once the applications are considered by different members of the admissions committee, 450 candidates are chosen to proceed to the next stage. At that point, applicants undergo an hour-long interview with a faculty member and a medical student.

"Once you've succeeded academically, what really stands out are people who have consistently done well in other things, whether it be in music, sports or work in the community," Shandling says.

"The admissions team looks for people who can work well with other people – team players who are able to communicate."

When making these kinds of decisions, Shandling is aware that the results of the admissions process will have an impact on the effectiveness of the health-care system many years down the road.

"It take 10 years for a doctor to become a full-fledged part of the system," Shandling says.

On the other hand, the Ontario Medical Association's recent decision to turn down a package of government incentives that attempted to alleviate physician shortages highlights how difficult it is to resolve health-care problems that may have begun years ago.

Recent press reports have indicated that Ontario, for example, is currently facing a shortage of family doctors, a scarcity of physicians willing to work weekends and an insufficient number of doctors in rural areas. These shortfalls are partially a result of decisions made a decade ago by governments across Canada in an attempt to cut health-care costs by reducing the number of doctors in the system. At that time, the University of Toronto's medical school had its positions slashed from 250 to 175.

In addition, Shandling notes that shortages in the number of physicians is only one aspect of the problem. Medical school faculties have to consider many other pieces of the puzzle.

"A health-care system is exceedingly complex and difficult to manage in its details. But it's the details that determine a lot of issues," Shandling explains.

Right now, many doctors practise as individual practitioners. However, in the future, it will be important to ensure that everybody is not only part of his or her own practice but part of a bigger system.

"Physicians have a lot of skills, but they also need to work with other people in order to make systems work," Shandling says. "So when you look at our applicants and the kind of non-academic things that are important, one of the key things we look for is working with other people in teams and being able to communicate."

In addition, the medical school has a gender- and culture-blind admissions process, Shandling says, noting that the first-year class really reflects the diversity of the population in Toronto.

Recently, "most of our entering medical school classes across Canada have had a majority of women over men and an ethnocultural diversity that has just exploded."

Shandling notes that when she went through medical school there weren't many senior women around. Now "there are more women entering medical school, as well as in almost all post graduate classes, which is an absolute reflection of people applying."

Something is definitely happening in high schools that is affecting the way our boys compete in the academic world. As a scientist, Shandling knows that choices made in one part of our educational environment will influence other aspects of our society.

Dr. Maureen Shandling

In health care, the trend towards a higher percentage of women in the field has a definite impact on medical manpower issues, Shandling says.

"Women practise medicine differently than men do."

Data published recently by the College of Family Practitioners indicates that women tend to provide more surgical and obstetrical services and practise fewer hours per week than men.

"There is no question that the shortage of doctors in the health-care system is not just a reflection of the number of medical school graduates. Availability is also an indication of the way physicians practise medicine and where they are planning to go."

"We realize that, as a medical school, we can't solve all of society's problems, but one of the things we've started doing is to look with some critical sense at what makes people decide to go into primary care or rural areas, so that we can make more informed decisions."

Shandling, who is also the deputy physician in chief at the Mount Sinai Hospital department of medicine, was born in Zimbabwe. At the age of four, she moved to Edmonton with her family. Her mother, Becky Shandling was principal of the Edmonton Talmud Torah before she retired, and her father Hym Shandling was a corporate and litigation lawyer before semi-retiring.

After attending the University of Alberta Medical School, Shandling completed an internship in internal medicine. When she came to Toronto to pursue a specialty in neurology, she met her husband Sheldon Levitt who is a partner at Quadrangle Architects Limited. Her daughter, Sarah, 16, is a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and her son, Eitan, 13, goes to United Synagogue Day School.

Besides her position at the University of Toronto medical school and her role in the administration of Mount Sinai Hospital, Shandling also has an active clinical practice in neurology.

Between her professional life as a doctor and her job as a mom, Shandling says her greatest challenge is just managing it all.

"There always seem to be so many things on the go," she says.

Yet, despite the demands that the medical profession presents, Shandling is thrilled about the calibre of people who still want to become physicians.

"That augurs well for you and me because these are the people who are going to look after us in 20 years," Shandling says.

Hebrew Hammer a filmfest hit

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to the CJN

The Hammer has arrived! The film, The Hebrew Hammer, that is!

The Hebrew Hammer is a Jewish private detective who proclaims the benefits of Jewish Power and who throws his Jewishness in the face of the gentile world.

Mordecai Jefferson Carver is the Hebrew Hammer. He wears two huge chai chains around his neck, he drives a long blue Cadillac with a Magen David as a hood ornament, and his office door announces him to be a "Certified Circumcised Dick."

Political correctness is not the Hammer's strong point. He is what he is and he's proud of it.

The Hebrew Hammer played to sold-out audiences of cheering, screaming and applauding young people two years in a row at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

This is farcical comedy at its best and you don't have to be Jewish to appreciate it, but it sure helps. The film is simplistic, often outrageous, but it is always a lot of fun.

Adam Goldberg plays the audacious Mordecai Jefferson Carver, the Hebrew Hammer, with tongue in cheek. Director/screenwriter Jonathan Kesselman, has taken Jewish stereotypes and turned them on their heads. His hero wears a long black leather coat, black fedora, payes and a tallit, and doesn't back away from anyone.

This is Kesselman's love letter to being Jewish and a direct response to Hollywood's tendency to portray Jews as neurotic schlemiels. In this case, Kesselman exaggerates each Jewish characteristic and turns it around into a positive feature.

You can't take the story line in The Hebrew Hammer too seriously. The Hebrew Hammer is hired to foil the plans of Santa Claus' evil son to destroy Chanukah. The important points in this film are the various signs and symbols that empower the Hammer and make him a hero to his people and a saviour of Jewishness.

Adam Goldberg is terrific as the Hammer. He is heroic enough to play the character and shows great exuberance in the way he embraces the role and shows off his Jewishness.

Peter Coyote is hilarious as the head of the Jewish Justice League who wears an Israeli army uniform and a Moshe Dayan eye patch.

Mario Van Peebles appears as the head of the Kwanzaa Liberation Front and the Hammer's staunch ally, while Judy Greer is the Hammer's sex-crazed Jewish girlfriend.

Now you can bring the fun into your own home and watch the movie on your own TV set. The Hebrew Hammer arrived in video stores, on video and DVD, a short time ago. Get out there and get your very own copy now and find out what you've been missing.

New novels take readers on journeys of the mind

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Toronto teacher H.M. Cooper has written two novels, one currently available and the other soon to be published.

Daughters of the Teardrop Sea (Publish America), Cooper's debut, is a surreal fantasy novel that takes place, mostly, in the mind of the protagonist.

Laura Sawchuk, a pregnant psychiatrist, is driving back from her friend's cottage when her car is struck by a drunk driver. As she lies in a coma, almost brain dead, her husband and family begin to discuss their options regarding her unborn child.

But unbeknownst to them, Laura is fighting her own battle. In the world of her imagination, populated by mythological figures, she goes on a harrowing journey to find and save her child.

The narrative unfolds in lush, dreamy prose rife with symbolism and liquid metaphors. Lyrical and imaginative, Cooper combines classic mythology with contemporary drama.

Something Lyrical for the Night, soon to be published by American Book Publishing, also deals with a mental journey of sorts, but this one is more literal than figurative.

Max is a young theatre actor going through an identity crisis in the 1970s. Almost overnight, he slips into schizophrenia and a world of delusion.

When he is unable to separate reality from his hallucinations and begins to converse with dead people and ancient lovers, his friends and family have him committed.

Through a series of letters to his uncle that he writes as therapy from a mental hospital, the narrator explores his own psychosis and realizes that he has to face each of his demons in order to be cured.

In both books, Cooper crafts poetic prose and displays a masterful command of the language. Something Lyrical provides an interesting insight into the mind of madness.

Though his narrative style tends to be passive – with more telling than showing – he makes up for this through rich imagery and eloquent prose.

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Children's entertainers Judy and David will be performing in Toronto over the next two weeks, in what is touted to be one of Canada's biggest family Chanukah celebrations.

The Juno-award winning stars of Treehouse TV's Judy and David's Boom Box will lead kids and parents in the fourth annual sing-along, dance-along Chanukah show.

As at every Judy and David concert, the audience will be singing along from the first note. The audience will be asked to join in to answer clues, stand up like a proud Maccabee, and find out more about the Festival of Lights.

With a little help from a Chanukah Boom Box, a mysterious magic menorah, and Bagel the Dog, Judy and David lead everyone on a storytelling adventure. Some audience members will even end up on stage in costume as Maccabees, soldiers and other key characters from the Chanukah story.

The live show will also offer both original and traditional Chanukah songs. Most of the show's tunes will be familiar to all in attendance.

"Every child will have access to every song. They don't need to read a song sheet or know songs in advance," says Judy.

This year, a portion of every ticket will support Na'amat's Tree of Love charity, providing essential day care for children of all denominations in Israel.

Since 1993, singing duo David and Judy Gershon – better known as simply Judy and David – have been providing hip, fun-filled children's music, and selling over 5 million recordings from the release of 17 cds. The Toronto-based couple, both 35, have accomplished all of this from their home basement office. This allows them to bridge work and childcare.

Having young children of their own has added a new perspective on their music, explains Judy. As with most families, they explain that juggling parenthood and careers has always been both a gratifying and delicate balance since their first born, Jared, arrived seven years ago.

"It has had a profound effect on our careers," Judy says, as she does the phone interview while drawing pictures with her daughter, 5-year-old Abigail. "They give you a deeper understanding. They will humble you. I more appreciate parents' time now. Parents take time out of their busy lives to give the gift of live music and giving us an opportunity to give it to them," she says.

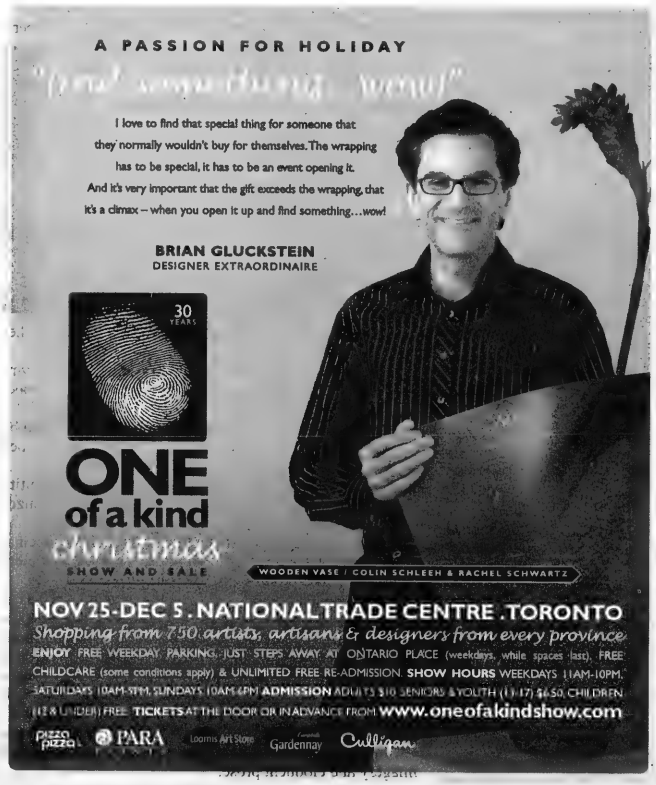
Judy and David's two kids have often come with them on tour. One excursion had them passing through the American South during the winter holiday season.

"I remember lighting a menorah in hushed tones at a Roy Rogers restaurant in Georgia," says David.

As for the upcoming Chanukah show, Judy says that it will be "a high energy" show, with each show being different.

David says that the audience should expect, "some great Chanukah 'chestnuts,'" and adds, "It will be a really fun way to learn about Chanukah and get really jazzed with really fun music."

David and Judy will be performing in Toronto at the Burton Auditorium, York University Dec. 4 (4:30 p.m.)and Dec. 5 (10:30 a.m. and 1:30 p.m.). They will perform at the Al Green Theatre, Mies Nadal JCC on Dec. 11 (6:30 p.m.) and Dec. 12 (10:30 a.m., 1:30 p.m. and 4:30 p.m.). Tickets ($18-$24) are available at Ticketmaster (416-872-1111).



A PASSION FOR HOLIDAY
I love to find that special thing for someone that they normally wouldn't buy for themselves. The wrapping has to be special, it has to be an event opening it. And it's very important that the gift exceeds the wrapping, that it's a climax – when you open it up and find something...wow!

Golem makes klezmer music hip

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

I don't understand a word of conversational Yiddish, except for some words that have sneaked into English, such as chutzpah and schlep.

But you don't have to understand Yiddish to enjoy klezmer.

One group that is singing klez to the Generation XYZ crowd is Golem, a New York-based band whose newest disc Homesick Songs, is a rich palette of sound and texture. Replete with accordion, tambourine, violin, trombone, and drums, if there were such thing as Jewish big band music, this'd be it.

Homesick Songs touts itself as a collection of love songs, not for people, but for places: towns, cities, and countries left behind in eastern Europe.

Odessa, the liner notes explain, was known for sailors, gangsters, Jews and eggplants. Indeed, strange combinations. The band's music itself blends disparate elements, transforming the old stylings of the Old Country, and infusing it with New York edge, sexiness and brashness. This is where eastern Europe meets the Lower East Side.

Golem borrows faithfully from shtetl sounds and words, yet somehow transforms old quaint eastern European folksongs into toe-tappingly hip tunes for this generation. And, like many things retro, klezmer has become cool.

The Golem refers to the fabled Jewish monster made of clay and given life by means of a charm.

"We named the band Golem because, first of all, monsters and Frankenstein are pretty wild – just like us," says Annette Ezekiel, bandleader, vocalist and accordionist of the band. "Plus, in our desire to reawaken Jewish music, we like to think of ourselves as a big crazy monster tearing through old Yiddish music, a little out of control, but always meaning well, just like the Golem."

Homesick Songs is the band's third album, and sung almost entirely in Yiddish. The exceptions are Rumenye, which includes some spoken-word storytelling in English; and the fourth track, Romanesh, which contains some whimsical spoken-language in English, although not suitable for children's ears.

Also on the new disc is the old Yiddish folk classic Chiribim, an upbeat ditty about noodle soup and a soaking-wet rabbi, just as cheery as it is, well, "bim-bum.."

True to its mix-and-match format, the band speaks and sings in languages other than Yiddish. Golem's previous album, Love Hurts, included tunes sung in Yiddish, Russian, and Ladino (a "lost" Hebraic-Spanish spoken by some Jews from Spain). In fact, Golem's website says that their bandleader can emcee weddings or bar mitzvahs in these, and other languages. So you're also just as likely to see Golem hopping the club circuit as playing in a shul gymnasium.

Listening to Homesick Songs is like reliving those enormous simchah dance circles through your own stereo system. Golem is really klezmer with spunk, and their music offers up an eclectic and cheeky version of an almost-lost music style from places long-gone, but not forgotten.

Herskovits and co-founder Jay Solomon, both of whom are in their fourth year of study, say many students have difficulty publicizing opinions that are taken seriously. They hope to encourage students to get involved in electronic communications via the Internet. "When you don't have credentials out there it's really difficult to do anything," Herskovits explains on the website – www.r2xmagazine.com – which was launched in November.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On Feb. 13, 1945, 1,100 American and British aircraft bombed the German city of Dresden in an excruciatingly punishing 15-hour raid, the sheer ferocity of which was unprecedented in the bloody annals of modern warfare.

The planes dropped thousands of tons of high-explosive bombs and incendiary devices, killing upward of 40,000 people.

The single most devastating Allied bombing of World War II, the raid destroyed the beautiful historic centre of Dresden – the Florence of the Elbe – and may well have convinced the Nazis that they were fighting a losing cause.

But to some, the attack on Dresden – a supposedly defenceless city far removed from the Nazi war effort – was nothing less than an atrocity and little more than an act of spite and vengeance. Such is the enduring controversy that when Queen Elizabeth II recently paid a state visit to Berlin, the German press demanded that she apologize for the destruction of Dresden. Stopping short of their demand, she spoke of the "appalling suffering" suffered by both sides.

In Dresden: Tuesday, February 13, 1945 (HarperCollins), Frederick Taylor, a British historian specializing in Germany, skilfully dissects the bombing and places it in its proper historical perspective.

And in an unexpected bonus, he deals with the fate of Dresden's Jewish community. Its last remaining members, 200 out of a prewar total of 6,000, were scheduled to be deported on Feb. 16, but the bombing left the Nazis' diabolical plan in splinters.

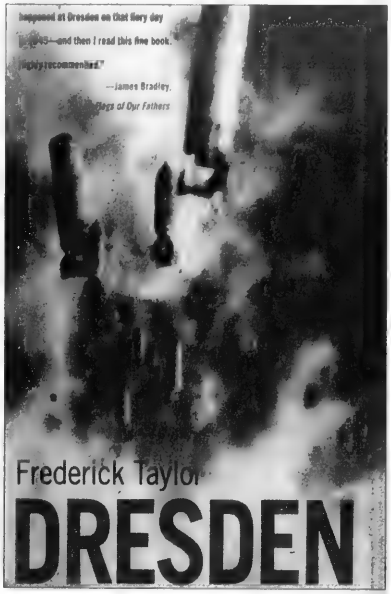
For Jews such as Victor Klemperer, an academic in a mixed marriage whose diary was published several years ago, the raid was not a cataclysm but a miraculous delivery. Amid the chaos that enveloped Dresden, he tore the telltale yellow Star of David from his lapel and found his way to safety.

Dresden, in eastern Germany, was renowned for its rich cultural life and its magnificent buildings, palaces, museums and statuary. The brassiere was invented there and Dresden was the first European city to manufacture cigarettes, coffee filters, teabags and squeezable toothpaste. Camera and optical factories, however, constituted the bedrock of its industrial might.

Dresden, too, was an important transit point for military traffic, and that was a prime justification in the Allies' decision to firebomb it.

Even before Adolf Hitler assumed power in 1933, Dresden was a Nazi stronghold. The party won 37.7 per cent of the overall vote in the 1932 Reichstag election, and the local Nazi newspaper, Der Freiheitskampf, had the largest circulation of any newspaper in the city.

Levels of anti-Semitism had always been relatively high in Dresden, its small Jewish population notwithstanding. The influential, anti-Semitic historian Heinrich von Treitschke – who wrote the notorious essay A Word About Our Jewry and coined the odious phrase, "The Jews are our misfortune" – was born in Dresden.



By the summer of 1938, Jews who had not had the foresight or will to leave were in dire straits. They were banned from local spas, forbidden to board regional buses or move around Dresden without police permission. Klemperer, a patriot and a decorated veteran of World War I, had lost his job, his house and his savings. But by virtue of being married to a Christian, he had averted deportation.

In October 1938, 724 Polish Jews in Dresden were packed into special trains under police guard and sent across the border into Poland. On Kristallnacht, less than a month later, Nazi-orchestrated mobs burned Jewish-owned shops and Nazi stormtroopers torched Dresden's venerable synagogue, a half-Romanesque, half-Oriental structure designed by the famous architect Gottfried Semper.

The Nazis deported the first Jews on Jan. 21, 1942, cramming 224 people into unheated boxcars. With dripping irony, Taylor notes that they travelled as third-class single-journey passengers, with a group discount.

On Feb. 27, 1943, Dresden's remaining Jewish leaders were dispatched to the Hellerberg labour camp, as were Jews from neighbouring cities – Erfurt, Halle, Lepizig, Plauden and Chemnitz – in the following days. On March 3, they were shipped to Auschwitz.

Officials realized that Dresden would be subjected to a serious air raid sooner or later, precedents already having been set.

The northern port of Lubeck was hit on Palm Sunday, March 28-29, 1942, with a loss of 320 civilians and soldiers. In retaliation, the Germans bombed the British town of Bath, killing 400.

In the wake of German raids on Exeter, Canterbury, Norwich and York in 1943, the Allies carried out a succession of reprisal raids against Hamburg, Kassel and Leipzig. The bombing of Kassel claimed the lives of 10,000 civilians.

The Allies did not let up. Berlin was bombed in February 1944 and Freital, southwest of Dresden, was hammered in August. Dresden's turn came on Oct. 7 when 30 American B-17s struck its Friedrichtstadt marshalling yards and nearby facilities, killing 270 people, including 40 Jews. On Jan. 16, 1945, 376 civilians were killed when 127 liberators bombed Dresden again.

But the worst was yet to come. On Feb. 13, Dresden was mercilessly bombarded, not once but twice. Firestorms devoured almost 12,000 buildings, including the Wehrmacht's main command post and factories vital to Germany's war machine.

"Although we were 40 miles from Dresden, fires were reddening the sky ahead," a British bomb aimer later wrote. "Six miles from the target, the streets of the city were a fantastic latticework of fire…"

Taking advantage of the anarchy, Klemperer passed himself off as a homeless Aryan victim who had lost his papers and belongings. Then, armed with ration cards, he and his wife fled the bedlam.

In mid-April, two weeks before Hitler committed suicide, and with the Red Army pouring into Berlin, Allied bombers again returned, wiping away Dresden as a major railway junction.

In a grisly aside, Taylor reports that the bodies of thousands of civilians were burned under the supervision of seasoned SS experts from the Treblinka concentration camp.

Nazi propagandists, and neo-Nazis in the postwar era, claimed that 100,000 Germans were killed during the Dresden raids. But Taylor debunks this figure, saying that the death toll was really between 25,000 to 40,000.

And he obliterates the notion that the Dresden raids were mounted for purely vindictive reasons. "There seems little doubt that the strategic bombing campaign played a major role in the defeat of Germany."

Albert Speer, a leading Nazi official, acknowledged that relentless Allied bombings were effective. German war production plummeted as 35 per cent fewer tanks, 31 per cent fewer aircraft and 42 per cent fewer trucks were produced.

Taylor notes that "Dresden was… a functioning enemy administrative, industrial and communications centre… that lay close to the front line." And so, he concludes, the bombing of Dresden was neither irrational nor pointless.

"Whether it was wrong – morally wrong – is another question," he allows.

White Rose opera honours anti-Nazi German resisters

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Udo Zimmermann's bleak one-act modern opera, White Rose, pays tribute to brother and sister Hans and Sophie Scholl, who paid the ultimate penalty for their anti-Nazi activities.

The Scholls, students at the University of Munich and members of the White Rose resistance group, were executed on Feb. 18, 1943 after being convicted of writing and distributing leaflets deemed treasonous.

In their leaflets, "leaves of the white rose," these devout Christians denounced Hitler's tyrannical state, condemned the persecution and murder of Jews and called for a new democratic Germany within a federated Europe.

White Rose, which was staged at the MacMillan Theatre last Sunday night on a one-time basis, was produced and directed by Judy Kopelow to coincide with Holocaust Education Week.

Mounted in association with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the one-hour production unfolded on a bare stage blocked off by a black curtain and featured a cast of two, soprano Marta Matulewicz as Sophie and baritone Matthew Zadow as Hans. The grim setting was the Munich-Stadelheim prison in the hours before their execution.

As the opera opened, they each sat behind a big desk awaiting their fate. Behind them was an illuminated painting of Jesus. To their left, at the far end of the stage, was a jumbled mass of unopened suitcases, a bicycle, a basket of fresh white roses and he iconic photograph of a young Jewish boy in the Warsaw ghetto with his hands up in surrender.

The gloomy atmosphere was conveyed not only by the minimalist set but by the jarring, atonal music of Sabatino Vacca's 15-piece orchestra. The uneven blare of trumpets and the menacing beat of drums evoked the mood.

Matulewicz, a fine singer who can hit high notes effortlessly, looked remarkably like Sophie in her last known photograph. She wore a simple patterned dress and a sweater, with a daisy affixed near her heart, and her lustrous hair was parted severely.

Zadow, in his understated performance, was clad as a civilian, not as the soldier Scholl was on the eve of his demise.

As they sing Wolfgang Willaschek's libretto in German, an English translation appeared on an overhead screen far above the stage, which distracted viewers from the performers.

The lyrics summoned up doom and gloom. Hans heared moaning and weeping, while Sophie heared footsteps near her cell.

Midway through White Rose, Hans and Sophie hauled five blown-up photographs across the stage and let angelic beams of light fall down on them before propping them up against the curtain.

The photographs are evocative of the Holocaust and White Rose. The first is of the frightened Jewish boy in the ghetto. The second shows a flaxen-haired boy behind barbed wires. The third photograph is of a Jewish girl with pigtails and a yellow Star of David sewn on her lapel.

Sophie gazes at Hans and two other soldiers in the third photograph, and in the fifth photograph, they stand next to each other, both seemingly lost in their thoughts.

As White Rose reached its denouement, Hans and Sophie displayed a mixture of despair and strength. "My cries fall into nothingness," he declared. "Who will console my mother?" Sophie asked plaintively.

Recovering from their fleeting moment of weakness, Hans and Sophie exhorted their fellow Germans to be strong and courageous in the face of Nazi tyranny. "No more silence! Arise from your stupor!"

White Rose, which is not entertainment in the usual sense of the word, evoked the hopelessness of their situation and the courage of their convictions.

Argo lineman wins fourth Grey Cup

Starting quarterback Damon Allen missed much of the season and even left the Grey Cup in mid-game with a leg injury. He returned, however, and showed the veteran leadership that's expected of a 41-year-old QB with previous Grey Cup rings to lead the Boatmen to their victory.

Cantor, an 11-year veteran who stands 6-3 and weighs 210 lbs, points out that the Argos sported the CFL's third-best regular season record despite Allen's absence and other injuries. On a personal level in 2004, Cantor recorded 10 quarterback sacks (tied for third-best in the league) and 30 tackles.

Strong defence was a key factor in the Argos' Grey Cup win, as the team limited the high-powered Lions offence despite a shaky start.

Noah Cantor

The Lions' opening drive seemed inauspicious for the Argos. Lions QB Dave Dickinson marched the team up the field smartly, engineering a touchdown on their first possession.

Despite that slow start, the Argos never doubted themselves. "We were confident in what we'd do as a defence," Cantor said.

The Lions used a lot of play action early on "and they kept us off balance." But once the Argos got their bearings and took the lead, the defence felt the game was theirs to lose.

"We felt that with the lead, we would not let anyone beat us," Cantor said."They got a few yards, but our job was not to give up the big play. They're a big play team."

The Argos had expected Lions' quarterback Casey Printers, the league's Most Outstanding Player, would start the game, though they knew he had been injured. The defense was prepared to face either B.C. signal-caller, believing the Lions' offence would not be terribly different under either QB, though "we were aware of [Printers'] running ability," Cantor said.

Either way, the Argos expected to win. "For us, the biggest part of this year was that we didn't think it was a surprise to win. We believed in ourselves. All year long, people counted us out." Cantor said.

"Any time you go beyond your expectations, you're more excited than you would be normally," Cynamon said after the victory. "Because we were such big underdogs and everybody convinced us we couldn't win, as owners, we're even more excited."

With the season over, 33-year-old Cantor has already packed up his family and headed back to their year-round home in Vancouver.

Cantor played in B.C. for five years and he his wife Donna plan to raise their two daughters, Rachel, 3, and Maya, 1 on the west coast. A third child is expected in January.

Cantor has already staked out a future in Vancouver in the restaurant business.

A few years ago, he and a partner acquired a popular family restaurant called Vera's Burger Shack. Since then, they've expanded with three more outlets, and the eateries are doing well. Hamburgers, hot dogs, fries and milkshakes make up the heart of the menu, and by this time, Cantor is likely to have already resumed his role as a hands-on owner, flipping burgers for Vancouver's meat-lovers. The transition to vending ground beef must've come easily to Cantor. Back in his native Ottawa, his family is in the meat-packing business.

During a practice at B.C. Place during the Argos' road game in Vancouver earlier this season, Cantor's teammates were treated to their very own tailgate party. Cantor and his partner pulled out a portable barbecue and treated the Argos to an outdoor feast. It no doubt contributed to the good-natured camaraderie that was so instrumental in the Argos' success this year.

Cantor still has one year left on his contract, as well as an option year, but right now he's enjoying the euphoria of victory and not worrying too much about his football future. When he does hang up the pads, there will no doubt be plenty of burgers and fries to keep him busy.

Women assembling Maccabiah masters basketball team

Women's basketball is alive and well at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, where ladies in their 40s and 50s are hoping to represent Canada as master athletes at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Every Monday night since June, a group of energetic female hoopsters have been getting together under the tutelage of coach Eli Cohen to improve their skills and prepare for a trip to the 17th Maccabiah Games.

If enough teams enter, it could mean the Maccabiah Games would see its first-ever women's masters basketball competition.

Playing at what they call an "intermediate" level, the women say they aspire to more than just enjoying a good game of basketball.

"Along with keeping the spirit of competition alive, they are also making a significant contribution to the advancement of Jewish women's basketball at a master's level. With enough discipline, perseverance and determination, they are showing the world that women, even as they juggle careers and family, along with a million other things, still have time to play. They are blazing new trails for others who will follow in their footsteps and continue to break down barriers as they move forward, both on the court and in everyday life," the group said in a news release.

The women are seeking additional talent to bolster their roster. They are asking basketball-playing Jewish women over 40, who can play at an intermediate level, to try out for the team and "share in some of the most memorable moments you will ever experience, as well as have some slam-dunkin' fun."

Tryouts begin this month. For more information, contact Barbara Goldberg at 416-418-4647 or by e-mail at goldyb52@hotmail.com.

Chanukah with the Porters

Do you know what it's like to laugh so hard the tears roll down your face and your stomach hurts? This type of laughter occurs with a really close friend or family member and it's contagious. It happens to me when I go home for Chanukah dinner with my family.

something
By MIRIAM PORTER

Like every family, we are not perfect, but we sure know how to have a good time. Mixed in with some arguing and occasional screaming are intense laughing fits. Anything can set us off. It could be a childhood memory or vacation we were all on, the picture in the photo album of us wearing now outdated glasses or sporting a crazy haircut, the hilarious experiences we have shared apple picking, going to an animal farm or playing board games, or even a secret we remembered that was crucial then but ridiculous now. Once the laughter starts, it spirals out of control until we are laughing so hard we can't speak.

Over the years my ex-boyfriends have had the pleasure of accompanying me home for these Chanukah dinners and catching a glimpse of the Porter festivities. For them, it must have been as if they were outside, and looking in through glass walls at a magnificent orchestra playing. It looked beautiful, but they didn't fully understand what was going on. And why should they? That is what family is for. You have "in" jokes that no one else understands and sometimes words are not necessary.

But for every person I brought home, a present was always waiting there for them. Not just from my parents, but from my grandmothers, who were there for dinner as well. My parents showed us it is important to make others feel comfortable and welcome in your home, no matter what their background or where they came from.

Tzedakah was also a part of my childhood. Quite often my sister and I received certificates that stated, "A tree has been planted in your name in Israel" or, "A donation has been made on your behalf to save a baby harp seal." Charity and helping others continue to play a huge role in my life as well as in my sister's.

To this day on Chanukah, my mother gives my sister and me a little colourful plastic dreidel. It is usually taped to the outside of our present, but I have also found it hidden at the bottom of a box or gift bag. My sister and I are both adults and I am not sure why we receive children's toys, but I always look forward to it. I excitedly spin my dreidel on the dining room table until either dessert arrives or I spill something. Then, like a child, I have to stop playing with it. I am not sure where all my dreidels have disappeared to, but there must be more than 30 of them hidden around the house.

Years ago, when my sister and I lived at home, our tradition during the eight days of Chanukah was to take turns setting up the menorah for the evening candle-lighting ceremony. We would carefully select the skinny coloured Chanukah candles and arrange them perfectly. My shamash candle was always blue.

These days, as I light my own menorah in my own apartment, I still choose a blue shamash and I still set up my candles early in the morning. I am grateful to my parents for always creating an exciting and meaningful holiday atmosphere, not just on Chanukah but also for every simchah. I know these wonderful memories, strong family values and traditions will one day be passed down from my sister and me to our own children.

Chag Samayach!

Understanding the meaning of silence

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Rather than witness an act of child abuse, I sometimes cower when I see a situation that could erupt into violence against a youth. I can quickly flip to the sports page after reading about the nuclear buildup in Iran, which could result in a death match between Israel and the Islamic republic.

URBAN WRITER

Upon learning a rabbi was savagely beaten by anti-Semitic thugs, I was somehow relieved to know that it happened in France, not Toronto. When I read a chapter in a book about slaves in Sudan, where a marauder sliced a child's arms off because she cried for her mother, I closed the book, felt nauseous, and promptly checked my e-mail for a letter from a friend.

I direct a humanitarian and relief organization and regularly hear about acts of meanness, heartlessness, torture, torment, war, violence, cruelty, sadism or rape. Regardless, I often try to avoid them, closing my eyes tightly so that not a trickle of wickedness can soak my soul.

I grapple with this. Why do I not respond more often and more courageously to the suffering in my world, when my reason, my religion and my conscience dictate that I must?

This is not self-criticism or a negative projection onto all Jews and peoples of the world.

I am past that. Mine is a serious journey submerged in bafflement and stupefaction about humankind. I am desperate to uncover the answers to these questions while witnessing frequent mass stillness in the face of the mayhem perpetrated by God's hoodwinked creations.

Is it possible that we really don't care about the suffering of others? Do we not know what to do? Are we are too afraid of pain or death to scrap and wrestle with the bad guys? Do we virtually ignore the torturous death of 30 million HIV/AIDS victims, hoping that they'll vanish? Am I a humanitarian only when the agony is in a faraway continent and its face is imaginary?

Please, let's consider this and finally reflect on the very truth of our humanness and what shackles our freedom to act, protest, complain, punch, object, and shout raucously on behalf of Israel, Darfur, the homeless, the elderly, victims of home invasions, battered daughters and the global increase in anti-Semitism?

Do a personal litmus test. Ask yourself whether Ottawa radio host Lowell Green was speaking to you when he said that we Jews don't stand up enough for ourselves (and, by inference, for others)?

Challenge yourself. How would you respond if Israel were in a full-blown war (God forbid), or if anti-Semitism exploded on the streets of Toronto? Would you fight the battle, despite the risk to you and your children? Do we celebrate the Righteous Gentile who acted courageously for us, but are unable to be righteous Jews ourselves?

Iranian bombs, soon to be capped with nuclear warheads, are in the hands of maniacal despots who dream about obliterating Israel. Two million people are dead in Sudan. One million are dead in Rwanda. Two-and-half million were massacred in Cambodia. Hundreds of old folks are totally alone along the Bathurst Street corridor.

These facts are as unambiguous as the stop sign at the end of the street. When we approach that sign, we stop, but so often when we face terror, we drive past. Why? What happens inside you and me, citizens of a free land, that far too often allows us to let evil act with reckless abandon?

Revealing the answers to these questions, and changing our actions accordingly, could be the next great universal movement, leading to a revolt of shalom – peace – and harmony.

CHANUKAH GREETINGS 5765

Set against the powerful stark beauty of the Negev, a lone cyclist conquers an imposing desert promontory, its harsh terrain, steep incline and insecure footing no impediment to his courage and determination. The hill is not too high.

Indeed, for Jews, no hill has ever been too high.

Chanukah reminds us of that. For the triumph of the few against the many, which the festival commemorates, carries the very same message: courage, determination, will and a strong belief in the justice of one's cause.

The cyclist was one of 20 Canadians in a group of some 250 riders who were in Israel recently to take part in Wheels of Love, Israel's largest annual multi-day charity sports event, on behalf of Alyn Hospital, Israel's only rehabilitation centre for infants, children and young adults. (More photos of the Wheels of Love event appear elsewhere in this special greetings section.)

The cyclists pedalled and carried their bikes for five days and nearly 400 kilometres from Mitzpeh Ramon, in the heart of the Negev Desert to Jerusalem, high in lofty, pine-scented Judea.

No hill was ever too high.

EDITORIAL

It is an example we should affix to our hearts as we travel the road that lies ahead.

Violent, hate-laden, Islamist terrorists continue to target the West and Israel, which, for them, bears the double stain of being both Jewish and a vanguard of alien, western values in "their" part of the world.

Suicide bombers too, continue to visit their "holy" death upon innocents. Though Israel's security forces succeed in thwarting most of the attempts by terrorists to kill Jews, they cannot, alas, prevent them all. Thus, Israelis were killed last year in Tel Aviv, Be'er Sheva and Jerusalem. They were also killed in the Sinai.

Even leaders of the Anglican and Presbyterian churches last year launched an assault of sorts upon the Jewish state. Both have proposed to their respective memberships that they divest from companies that do business with or in Israel.

And of course, there is the ever-present menace of Iran and its worrisome nuclear program. Who knows what its leaders' true intent is for the reactors they have built.

Undoubtedly, though, the highest hill that looms in the approaching horizon is Israel's disengagement from Gaza and from parts of the West Bank. Will it lead to societal strife? How will the bitter emotions be reconciled?

What Chanukah teaches us, what every child eventually learns from the earliest years when they hear the story of the Maccabees, is that we cannot avoid climbing the hills.

It is our destiny to do so, in part because it seems that hills lie permanently across the path of the Jewish people. But in greater part it is because seeking out the high places of human endeavour has been our defining mission since we all gathered at Sinai.

Thus, as we light the candles on the Chanukiyah and recall the ancient story that the incremental light symbolizes, we might also be reminded of the courage and determination symbolized by the lone cyclist and his refusal to turn aside from that imposing desert promontory.

As we do every year, we have assembled an eclectic array of stories and photos in this Chanukah Greetings section. We hope you enjoy them.

Chag urim sameyach.

Songwriter is silenced – long live her songs

By MICHAEL BROWN

Waiting for my turn in the barber shop recently, I picked up an old Maclean's magazine with a section on the 100 foremost Canadians of all time. I was curious, of course, and started turning the pages. The list included politicians, war heroes, sports figures, businesspeople, men and women of science and culture, artists and con-artists.

Although the panel of 27 judges included six I recognized as Jewish, I had a feeling I wasn't going to find many Jews on the list. As it turned out, professed anti-Semites outnumbered the bona fide Jews. The literature category, where I had expected to find some Jews, included Stephen Leacock and Anne of Green Gables (not her creator), but not Mordecai Richler, nor Leonard Cohen, nor A.M. Klein. (Margaret Atwood was also left off, so perhaps the judges stopped reading Can-lit in Grade 5.)

The list made me think about what a Jew might do to qualify for such a list. One thing is certain: he or she would not excel at something Jewish. In the Diaspora, both Jews and non-Jews tend to admire Jews who beat the non-Jews at their own game. The two Jews who were mentioned in Maclean's, Fannie Rosenfeld, the Olympic gold medal runner, and Henry Morgenthaler, the abortion guru, illustrate the rule. Neither made a notable contribution to Jewish life.

That observation led me to note how different the criteria for such a list would be in Israel. An Israeli list would also include politicians and war heroes, entertainers, maybe Olympic gold medalist Gal Friedman, a jurist or two, the odd business person and even kibbutz farmers. But there, rabbis stand a chance, the roster of writers would be long and the Jewish experience in one way or another would be the central concern of most of the writers and of a good many others, as well.

Songwriter/poet/musician/performer Naomi Shemer, who died just a few months ago, was just such an outstanding and yet representative Israeli. Shemer is best known abroad for the song that has become almost a second anthem of Israel, Jerusalem of Gold, composed serendipitously – some say prophetically – just before the Six Day War. In Israel, dozens of her songs are among the most popular in the canon, many of them folk classics that young and old know by heart.

Naomi Shemer

"We are all Naomi Shemer," the entertainer, Shaike Levi, wrote in Yediot Ahronot soon after her death. He recalled being in a pub one night, sitting alone and humming to himself one of Shemer's songs.

"When I got to the third line," Levi said, "a person nearby hesitantly joined in, but very quietly. By the fifth line, another was singing and then another, and by the refrain, it was as if a conductor were leading us: the whole pub was transformed into a well rehearsed choir."

Shemer's funeral was like that too. It drew thousands of mourners from all over the country. They included the president, the prime minister and just plain folks, the young and the old and everyone in between, the grunts and the glitterati, Orthodox and secularists, artists and movers and shakers, right-wing settlers and socialist kibbutznikim. It was a Jewish funeral: K'El Maleh Rachamim was chanted, and Shemer's husband, son, daughter and sister said Kaddish. And it was a kibbutz funeral, simple, four of her songs sung by everyone in place of a eulogy. She had left explicit instructions.

Israeli journalist Uri Sal'i has referred to Shemer as "the voice track of our lives," and President Moshe Katsav sounded a similar note in saying that her songs mark "the milestones of Israeli life." One of her last poems was Ilan, in memory of astronaut Ilan Ramon.

My son, Josh, remarked that her songs spoke for and to all the people, the way good folk songs do. For others, though, the same songs "were [more of] a heart-to-heart talk," expressions of feelings that are deeply personal yet shared by other Israelis, like the song Anachnu meoto hakfar (We Come from the Same Village).

This is a ballad about two best friends who grew up together and shared all of life's experiences until one was killed in war. "Now I walk through the green field" of our village, the surviving youth laments, "and you are on the other side of the fence," lying dead in the ground. A quintessential Israeli experience and an intensely personal one!

But Shemer's was more than an Israeli voice. It was also a Jewish voice. In a sense, her life and works are evidence of the centrality of Israel to the soul and spirit of the entire Jewish people. Here I'd like to focus on Naomi Shemer and her works as a way of understanding what Jews as a people, in Israel and everywhere, have lost with her passing.

Naomi Shemer was born in 1930 to immigrant parents from Lithuania in Kinneret, the second oldest of the kibbutzim that became the vital organs of the future state's infrastructure and the repository of its fundamental values. She grew up in Kinneret and returned there for a time when she was first married. As a student and then as an artist, she lived in Tel Aviv, but her sense of rootedness in the soil and setting of Kinneret never left her. It was there she chose to be buried, near her parents, near pioneer labour leader Berl Katznelson, and near the poet, Rachel, some of whose delicate love poems to the land of Israel Shemer had set to music.

Among the most beautiful is one titled Kinneret, with its sensuous invitation to "reach out and touch" the land and its promise never to forget the "chesed ne'urim" of that bucolic setting. Chesed ne'urim is the prophet Jeremiah's term for the love and nurture God lavished on the newborn people of Israel in their desert wanderings. Shemer called the Kinneret cemetery "Gan Eden ishi sheli" (my personal Garden of Eden), evoking both the beginning and the end of life and, at the same time, expressing her love for the place and for the whole land of Israel. Kinneret was one of the songs sung at the funeral.

Shemer had ample time to contemplate death in the last decade or so of her life, as she battled cancer. She waged war on the disease without rancour. Death is "an inseparable part of life," she said once, "and when it's over… it's over. Nothing to do about it."

But she didn't give up easily. Od lo ahavti dai (I Haven't Loved Enough Yet) is one of her best known and most sung songs. "There are lots of things I want to do," the song declares, so "I flee from you as from a plague." The tone is seemingly optimistic and light-hearted, a young person's refusal to settle down before experiencing life to the full: "building a dream home… seeing snow at harvest time." The last line of the refrain is the familiar call to action from Pirkei Avot: "Ve'im lo achshav, aimatai?" (If not now, when?) But the song is also a refusal to come to terms with death; it was written during one of her early bouts of illness.

Naomi Shemer in the 1960s

Shemer's lyrics and melodies are deceptively simple. Songwriter Ehud Manor has called her "the most Israeli of voices," but hers was also a very Jewish voice. In the most natural way, she linked the language of the Bible and other classical sources to contemporary street Hebrew, as a number of the quotations cited here illustrate.

But students take note! While she was a popular song writer, she was also a stickler for good grammar. She chided her songwriter son, albeit with good humour, for writing songs full of grammatical mistakes. Her songs elevated – they never "stooped to conquer," and yet they reflected the fundamental values of the folk in all their tension and complexity.

After 1967, Shemer's rootedness in Israel and her love of the land transmuted themselves into right-wing politics, a strong conviction that there should be no Palestinian state west of the Jordan, that all the territory conquered in 1967 belonged rightfully and forever to Israel. For some years, she took to the barricades and marched in street demonstrations. From the song, Al kol eileh (All these things), came the motto of those opposed to returning Sinai to Egypt: "Please don't uproot what's been planted."

Eventually, as Shemer put it, she "came to understand that it was not in… [her] hands to change the course of history." She returned to music full time.

I suspect, however, that the issue was more complex than that. For one thing, Shemer had a very strong sense of Jewish fellowship, family and Israeli camaraderie. Her husband was more militant than she; her children are members of Peace Now, and she loved them all dearly. She also had love and respect for fellow Israelis whatever their politics. This, too, was expressed in her songs. Israelis were "anashim tovim be'emtza haderech" (good people in the midst of a journey), "ve'itam efshar litz'od" (and with them [all] it's possible to march).

Shemer understood that Israel was not a finished product. And even when they disagreed about essentials, she felt close to her co-workers in the moulding of Israeli culture – an obituary in the daily Ha'aretz called hers a "determining role" in that enterprise.

More important still was Shemer's commitment to the fundamental Jewish value of peace. This comes through in songs written all during her life; it was a much stronger impulse than the desire for an expanded Israel.

'A sense of the finger of God'

In her early hit, Machar (Tomorrow), there is a vision of peace that echoes Isaiah's messianic vision: "A lion will lead a flock of sheep." "And all this," the song continues, "is neither fable nor dream/ It's as clear as the noonday light/ All this will come to pass tomorrow/ And if not tomorrow…/ Then the day after."

In the children's song, Shlomit Builds a Sukkah, there are these lines: "Shalom, wonder sukkah/ How good and how pleasant! Shlomit has built a sukkah of peace." The phrase, "sukkah of peace," comes from the evening prayers. And it is wondrous, because peace is elusive, but also because when it comes, it is beautiful and restorative like sleep. And, of course, the name "Shlomit" is derived from the word "shalom."

In another song, The Eighth Day of the Week, Shemer foretells the day, an ordinary weekday, when a flower will sprout from the barrel of every gun and the guards at the gates will serve water to every thirsty person. "And should the chief of staff ask about the good times," it continues, "tell him that it is a bit odd… but grass is growing in the fox holes, every gun belt is hanging from a tree branch."

Even Lu Yehi (May It Be), from the Yom Kippur War days when she was quite militant, asks God "to keep away… sudden fear and war." Interestingly, Shemer had originally set the words of Lu Yehi to a Beatles melody, Let It Be. Her husband objected, because, he said, "We are fighting a Jewish war," and a war song needs Jewish music. So she wrote the haunting melody now so familiar.

A commitment to peace and love of the land of Israel were not the extent of Shemer's Judaism.

"I grew up on a Judaism without mitzvot," she acknowledged in an interview, but "I have a sense of the finger of God." A Kol Aileh is actually a prayer addressed to the traditional God of Israel who intervenes in history.

One of her well-known later songs, Hevlei Mashiach (The Travails of the Messiah's Advent), contains the following verses: "When I have neither direction nor goal/ On my heart rests a charm/ A little song [with the words:]…/ Behold! The travails of the Messiah's advent begin… today. Sometimes I suffer blow after blow/ When it's bad and it's bitter/ Right then I sing…/ Behold! The travails of the Messiah's advent begin… today."

The language is religious and offers hope in a time of despair. It also echoes the sense of imminent redemption of the settler movement. Ayin veyesh (Being and Nothingness) is another of her messianic songs. It acknowledges that Israelis "have no great rivers, no rain in summer, no great smoggy cities… no dark forests… no tower, its head in the clouds…[But] we do have," the song proclaims, "a share in the legacy of [King] David, the son of Yishai," the ultimate messianic figure.

More mainstream Jewish is Shemer's ability to see the everyday as "stunningly meaningful." Her song, Yesh Li Chag (I Have a Holiday), sets this out most clearly. "When the holiday shouting grows silent," it says, "When suddenly the six-year-old knows how to walk… When the baker bakes me bread… And when the big sun hangs in the sky… That's my daily holiday… Hallelujah [Praise to God] for things like this… Hallelujah every day and how wonderful/ Hallelujah for the holiday that never ends!" Would that we all shared that sense of wonder and gratitude for the small things!

But if the world is suffused with meaning and the finger of God is evident, there is also cause for doubt, Jewish doubt regarding faith based on the "finger of God" in human affairs. In the song, Akedat Yitzhak (The Binding of Isaac), it is the mountains that beg mercy for the child, not Abraham, his father, who is silent as stone. It's an implied critique of both Abraham, the believer, and God in whom he believes.

A lullaby addressed to two children, It's Already Late, Yonatan and Michali, sets out the doubts unambiguously in these words: "There's the dawn light under the door/ Come to wake sleepy children/ I would surely pray now/ If I knew to whom."

Naomi Shemer's songs are not consciously "religious poetry." Like most Jews, Shemer is sometimes moved to prayer. More importantly, by evoking love of the people and the land of Israel and love and appreciation of the Bible, the prayer book and the Hebrew language, the wellsprings of Jewish life, and by evoking a commitment to peace and the love of family and friends, her songs help us to reunite with our most precious and sacred values.

These songs and their composer do something else, as well. And here I return to North America whence I began. We have no equivalent of Naomi Shemer in our list of Canadian Jewish greats. Leonard Cohen is a poet and songwriter, but while he is well known, he does not enjoy anything like Shemer's universal appeal and iconic status. The American-Jewish composer and lyricist Irving Berlin comes closer. He was one of the United States' most popular songwriters for decades, plucking the strings of America's heart. Most people of a certain vintage know his songs and can probably sing a few. The three for which he is best known are God Bless America, White Christmas and The Easter Parade.

In the comparison, we see, I think, not only the Jewish authenticity of Naomi Shemer, but the centrality of Israel to a vibrant, authentic Jewish culture and, even more, to the Jewish soul and spirit. Only in Israel could her words and thoughts resonate with a wide public. Only in Israel is it possible to bring to life the ancient Jewish tongue and texts and make them speak the language and raise the questions of the contemporary and the everyday as once they did. Only there are the faith and doubts, the values and habits of our ancestors – renewed, altered, transformed – once again in full bloom.

There will be no new songs from Naomi Shemer. But her classic repertoire will still be sung, now recalling the experiences and deepest feelings of the people of Israel during much of the nation's formative period.

"Sing unto the Lord a new song!" the Psalmist said. Naomi Shemer did that, setting the renewed but ancient voice of Israel to the music of our time. She enriched us all. May her memory be a blessing.

Feeling the fear in a Negev town

By IGAL HECHT

On Sept. 30, 2004, Talam Tafra and her family were huddled in their sukkah in the Negev town of Sderot. The temporary dwelling was filled with a sense of festivity as they celebrated one of the most joyous holidays in the Jewish calendar.

At the same time, a few hundred metres away in the Palestinian town of Beit Hanoun, a Hamas terrorist launched a Qassam rocket. Just outside their grandmother's sukkah, four-year-old Yuval Ababa and his two-year-old cousin Dorit Enso were playing. Piercing the children's laughter, the Qassam rocket tore through the sukkah, killing Dorit and Yuval and injuring a score of others.

The next day in Toronto, I purchased an Israeli newspaper. The faces of the two murdered children beamed out from the front page. Their faces haunted me and I became angrier and angrier as our local Canadian media reported on the Israeli army entering Gaza while omitting the fact the preschoolers were murdered and that Sderot has been bombarded by more than 400 Qassam rockets in the last two years.

As my frustration grew, I, along with coproducer, Talia Klein, decided to self-fund a new documentary titled "Kasam." Two weeks later, with the help of local Israeli filmmakers, I was in Sderot.

Our first day of filming was spent in the local market.

"No one wants to come and shop outside anymore. It's like playing Russian roulette," says Nissim, who has spent the last 48 years in Sderot.

"One landed right beside me," he adds, pointing to the ground, "and three more landed in various parts of the market. Who's going to risk themselves?"

A customer who just bought a bag of clementines adds, "We live in constant fear. My six-year-old grandchildren hear a loud sound and they start shouting 'Qassam! Qassam!' and we can't protect them, and to be honest, we are terrified ourselves."

Three months before the murder of Yuval and Dorit, four-year-old Afik Ohayon and his mother were walking to kindergarten, as they did every day, when a Qassam rocket launched moments earlier from nearby Beit Hanoun exploded beside them. The shrapnel ripped through Afik's young and innocent body. His mother lay in a pool of her own blood and watched her son slowly slip away from her.

Coty Malka's hands tremble as she recalls that day. Her five-year-old daughter Taeer was one of Afik's classmates. Her voice cracks, and she pauses. She takes a long puff from her cigarette and continues.

"I ran to the kindergarten and started shouting 'Taeer! Taeer!'but there was no answer. I finally saw the teacher who assured me that Taeer was safe, but that Afik..."

I spoke to Coty, a mother of five, in her apartment as night fell on Sderot.

"Every night I can't sleep. I wake up at two, make myself coffee, and just sit. What am I supposed to do? How can I protect Taeer? She comes into my bed at night and says 'Don't worry mom, I'll protect you from the Qassam.'"

As she finishes her thought, the door opens, and Taeer, a beautiful young girl, walks in. I ask her to tell me about Afik.

She begins to talk about him in the present tense, as if she still plays with him in the sandbox.

"He's with God, looking at us. I miss playing with him," she says.

I feel the tears well up in my eyes.

Over the next few days of filming, camerawoman Ofri Segev and I discovered a town full of despair and loss.

Sason Sara, a local shopkeeper and one of Sderot's most prominent figures, told me about his crumbling marriage.

"I've lived in Sderot for most of my life. I have three children, and I just got them all cellphones so I can know where they are at all times," he says.

"A Qassam fell right beside my shop and you never know when they're going to fall. My wife wants to leave the city, and has threatened to take the children and leave me if we don't move."

The phone rings during our interview, and he lets me speak to his wife. "I can't take it anymore, you're not supposed to live this way," she tells me.

As he hands a customer a pack of cigarettes, he adds, "Netanyahu, Sharon all of them just don't care about us. They promise us money, but who feels it. They promise us security, and missiles rain down on us daily. All of these self-righteous Tel Aviv types want to pull out of Gaza, but they don't have to live with the consequences."

Driving out of Sderot, we try to make our way to Beit Hanoun. We get stopped at the Erez Checkpoint and are not allowed into Gaza.

"It's too dangerous, he [Arafat] might die today," a soldier tells us.

We head toward a nearby hill overlooking the rubble of Beit Hanoun. "A tale of two cities," I think to myself, "each being destroyed by individuals who don't have to think about the consequences of their actions."

Uzi Bar-On, a resident of Kibbutz Nir Am, echoes the sentiment. The kibbutz is a five-minute drive from Sderot and has seen its share of Qassam attacks.

Uzi, who has survived a number of Qassam attacks, is still optimistic.

'Old leaders continue to bury the young'

"I have friends in Beit Hanoun. We've been friends for more than 30 years. They call me every time a Qassam falls, and I try to find out about them every time [the Israeli army] goes in there… We care about each other. It's not much, but it's something."

During one of our final days in the area, Ofri drove us to the street where Yuval and Dorit were murdered. I film the candles and teddy bears that mourners have left as a makeshift memorial. Ofri approaches me and whispers that Dorit's mother is standing right behind me.

I stop filming and turn toward her. She walks up to us. I shake her hand and offer my condolences. She nods her head. Ofri asks her if she's doing well. The mother points to her young daughter and says, "She asks where Dorit is every night. I don't know what to tell her." With that, she leaves us.

I am very silent on the flight back to Toronto. I think about the visuals and interviews. I wish that the film didn't have to be made, that Yuval, Dorit, Afik and all the innocents who have been lost on both sides could still play, laugh and grow.

Old leaders continue to bury the young. I always thought it was supposed be the other way around.

Rosh Hashanah in Nigeria?

By HARTLEY SPRINGMAN

Next year in Nigeria? Probably not. But if you ever find yourself in the Republic of Nigeria around a Jewish holiday, you might want to get connected with one of its historical Jewish communities.

I was lucky enough to find out about the Jews of Nigeria just before Rosh Hashanah. My guide was Remy Ilona, a Nigerian Jew from the Igbo ethnic group. To hear him speak of the history of the Nigerian Jews is to witness true passion, love and commitment for Judaism and, of course, Israel. He first took me to Shabbat services a couple of weeks before the start of the New Year at the Gihon congregation in a town outside Abuja, the capital city.

I had no idea what to expect before that first Shabbat service. I had heard rumours before I arrived in Nigeria that some Igbos believed they were Jewish, but after seven months in Nigeria I had almost given up my quest to find them. On our first visit, Remy told me that he believed all Igbos were once Jewish, originally coming to southeastern Nigeria through the old African trade routes from Israel as part of the original Diaspora.

Over the years, most Igbos converted to Christianity and lost their connection to Judaism. Nevertheless, small pockets of Igbo Jews have survived and passed on their traditions, while at the same time helping other Igbos to Judaism, if they so desire.

In the weeks leading up to Rosh Hashanah, I received many calls from my new friend Remy. While he was excited that I was planning to attend the service with him at Gihon, he was also planning another special event that day to coincide with the New Year. On that day, he planned to open a Hebrew Research Centre – the first of its kind in Nigeria – in the same town as the synagogue, and he wanted me to preside over the opening ceremony.

On the morning of Rosh Hashanah, Remy was at my home by 7 a.m. and we were off to the synagogue. Upon entering, I was greeted by simple nods and smiles as if I were a longstanding member, and with a look of contentment from the elders who appeared pleased that I had made good on my promise to join them.

While foreigners in Nigeria are looked at with suspicion in some circles, I suspect these Jewish Nigerians looked at a Jew from another land as a link to the broader Jewish community. And the fact I had spent a few months in Israel after high school (I left out the fact I was actually teaching hockey at the Canada Centre in Metulla) gave them an even greater connection to a land and community they hold so dear.

But the Gihon congregation didn't really look to me for any recognition or guidance. As I walked in that morning, the service continued and everyone's attention remained on the elder who led the prayers. The men and women were separated (albeit by only a few feet), as in an Orthodox congregation. The men were all adorned in kippot and tallit that had either been donated by other foreigners who had passed through or, in some cases, had been crafted by the congregants themselves.

Prayer in Gihon

After a couple of hours, I left with Remy to help with the opening of his Hebrew Research Centre. With Yemeni Jewish music playing in the background, I was introduced by Remy to give some opening remarks. (Luckily, he had prepared a speech for me.) After Remy gave his speech, we spent some time inside the centre having a cold drink and browsing through the books, maps and pictures that he had gathered over the years.

The story of Nigeria's Jews has yet to register on the radar

When I returned to Gihon, the congregation was taking their lunch break. As I sat down, a soft-spoken elderly man placed what looked like a seder plate in front of me. It was filled with sliced apples and a bowl of honey. After that traditional snack, I was given a small cup filled with Manischewitz peach liqueur, and then a fish head on a plate, which, after seven months in Nigeria, was not so strange for me.

As we ate – and in true Jewish fashion, they kept telling me to eat more – the man beside me told me more about the history of Igbo Jews and their struggle to keep their congregations strong.

It is fascinating how these Nigerians struggle to keep their families and community practising Judaism in a country so dominated by Christianity and Islam. Fortunately, while they are seen by some Nigerians as a bit strange, they do not face any anti-Semitism. Of course, they do not find many allies in their support for Israel, but that should not come as such a surprise.

We've all heard stories about Jews in Ethiopia, and even in Uganda, but the story of Nigeria's Jews has yet to register on the radar of those seeking to help isolated Jewish communities. If you want to learn more about the Nigerian Jewish community, you can e-mail me – hartley@prospect-nigeria.org – and I will keep you updated as I learn more about them myself.

A tale of two embassies

By JUDI ORON

An article in The Canadian Jewish News recently reviewed a book by former Israeli ambassador to Ethiopia, Asher Naim. The media have been marking the 20th anniversary of the 1984-85 famine in Ethiopia.

As Jews, we also note that this is the 19th anniversary of the exposure in the press of Operation Moses – an exposure that effectively slowed the immigration of Ethiopian Jews to Israel to a trickle. This event left the Jews stranded en route in Ethiopia and in the horrific camps of Sudan. As we watch with disbelief the images from Darfur unfolding today, we can only imagine what this trek must have been like for the Beta Israel, as Ethiopian Jewry call themselves.

As former director of the Jerusalem Post Funds and later head of a small, volunteer organization working with the Beta Israel community, I travelled to Addis Ababa for the first time in 1990.

Now, as a recent returnee to Canada from Israel, I found one entry in my journal of that year particularly apt. Many of my fellow Jewish Canadians may take odds with this entry but, to me, the contrast between my two countries couldn't have been more clearly defined than by my visit to the two embassies that represented these countries. This was the entry in my diary:

> 'The contrast... couldn't have been more clearly defined'

Day I, Addis Ababa: I set out to register at the Canadian Embassy and, squinting at the small letters in the National Tourist Office map, I finally reach the correct building in this once-posh but now down-at-the-heels part of town. The consul informs me that the staff is about to break for lunch. He hands me some printed instructions for Canadians in Ethiopia, and I sit in the anteroom alongside a group of tattered, would-be immigrants, to read it and fill out a registration form. No one is called into the inner rooms while I wait. There is a war going on quite close to the outskirts of the city and last night I even heard the sounds of that war. But in this room, there is no sense of urgency.

Precisely an hour later, the consul returns and ushers me into his office. I explain that I am writing a book on Ethiopian Jewry, and that I am a resident of Jerusalem.

"Yes, we had a young lady here a few weeks back, from some Jewish organization in Canada. I tried to explain to her," he begins to speak with a distinct whine, "that my job here is to deal with all Ethiopians, not to single out any one group of people. I am sick and tired of being asked by Parliament members and Jews about the Falashas. We are understaffed here, you know, and these people just have to understand that I have more important things to do than to answer questions about the Falashas.

"You have to realize," he continues, "that the Falashas are no different from any other Ethiopians. You see them in the streets. They look just like any other people here. They are like any other people here. It's wrong of the Israelis to tell them that they are Jews and that they have a right to go to Israel. And the Ethiopian government is treating them" (does he mean the Jews, the Israelis? I wonder) "just like any other missionaries have been treated in this country."

At my look of alarm, he nods, emphatically. "Yes, missionaries, what else would you call them? Ethiopia has evicted any religious groups that try to missionize the people, and this is no different from what the churches have been trying to do."

I protest that the Falashas see themselves as Jews and have always kept themselves separate from the Christian and Muslim communities. I add that the Falashas have been subjected to discrimination in the past for being Jewish.

The consul is incredulous. "Show me one Falasha who has been mistreated for being a Falasha," he says belligerently. "I tell you like I told that young lady," again, he sneers visibly, "the Falashas are treated no differently here than anyone else. All the Ethiopians are having a tough time here right now. And it's our job at the embassy to help out wherever we can, not just to single out the Falashas. They are getting too much help as it is. I used to be very friendly with [former] Israeli ambassador [Meir] Joffe, and I used to tell him that he wasn't doing anybody a service by singling out the Falashas. We were very good friends, you know," he assures me, as though he suddenly realizes that I might not be totally happy with his views.

I tell him that if he has the time, I can give him an hour-long lecture on the ways in which Falashas have been mistreated over the last centuries precisely because they were Jewish. He begins to backtrack over the same territory, and eventually we part ways. As I leave through the waiting area, I can't help feeling guilty for the time I took in Campbell's office. The same people are sitting in the waiting room with the same hopeless expressions on their faces.

The Israeli Embassy is surrounded by a high concrete wall, upon which an endless succession of sculpted chanukiyot march around the property. At the gate, I am greeted by a security guard who stands aside to let me enter. I stand in line behind a couple from Sri Lanka who are arguing with someone over an intercom. They are trying to get a visa to visit Israel for the Christmas holidays. The security guard wants to know if they have friends in Israel. After a minute of bickering over the intercom, they are buzzed into the compound. I move forward to identify myself and am told that I can come up the path to the embassy building.

The road to the embassy is steep and dusty with that red clay that never seems to settle, and is found throughout Addis's often-unpaved streets. As I work my way up the mountain, I stir up a cloud of dust. Looking around me, I get my first intimation that this embassy is not going to be anything like the one I just left, or indeed anything like my expectations of what an embassy should look like.

Problems were being resolved every day

The first thing I notice is that, unlike the Canadian Embassy, the grounds of the Israeli Embassy are filled with people. Old and young, well dressed and in rags, healthy and vigorous or ill and maimed, the place is jam-packed with life. Some are sitting patiently in the hot morning sun, others are moving purposely in different directions, but the overwhelming impression is of a kaleidoscope, with constant changes in the pieces that make up the whole picture.

As I make my way up the last few steps to the embassy building, I catch a flash of red to my left. On the patio outside the building a white security guard is holding hands and dancing in a circle with a little Ethiopian girl wearing a red sweatsuit. The two are totally self-absorbed. Another guard sits behind a glass compartment and buzzes me into the embassy building. Once inside, I greet old friends, and after a short time, they lead me to a large wooden and straw hut where faranj – non-Ethiopians – are sitting at desks interviewing Ethiopian Jews.

They pull up a chair for me, apologize for having no time, and quickly get back to work. No time for a break in this place, I learn. An Ethiopian family sits down at one of the desks, and the mother pulls out a breast and begins feeding her youngest child. Thus begins my first day at the embassy.

"The Israeli Embassy deals with a population larger than that of Sderot, with one-10th of its staff," says (then) consul, Micha Feldman. "The staff work 10 to 12 hours a day, six and sometimes seven days a week. Most have either learned Amharic or study it in their so-called 'off' hours. They are usually exhausted, often sick with the flus and stomach upsets that plague the local people. They are bitten incessantly by fleas. They are constantly surrounded by hundreds of people who desperately need their help and attention, and they want very much to be able to solve their problems."

In all, I spent six weeks mingling with the staff at the Israeli Embassy. During that time, I saw many things that I found confusing, and a lot that I questioned. Some of those questions have since been answered to my satisfaction. Others linger in my mind like festering sores. But I never saw anything that I would have known how to change for the better. Before, during and after my trip, I heard many accusations hurled at the embassy personnel. Addis is that kind of place. Journalists and Knesset members come for a few days and the echoes of their visits reverberate throughout the embassy a short while later.

Looking back at my diary entry of 1990, I can say that in that building with the chanukiyot marching all around it, many, many problems were being resolved every day. For every problem that was solved, a dozen more cropped up before the staff had a minute to enjoy their success. To say that I was impressed would be to understate the issue.

I came to Addis that year with many fears, one of them being that "they" – those powerful faranj at the embassy, some of whom are my friends – might indeed have been the uncaring, incompetent and even corrupt human beings that they had often been accused of being. That fear was laid to rest when I saw how much effort and caring was invested in the day-to-day running of the compound. It was put even more in perspective, albeit perhaps unfairly, against the backdrop of my visit to the Canadian Embassy.

Toronto's Russian community hurts with Beslan

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

When Chechen terrorists killed more than 300 people in the Russian town of Beslan in September, the incident touched a number of Toronto Jews who hail from Ossetia, the small Russian province in the Caucasus near Chechnya where Beslan is located.

More than 1,000 children, parents and teachers were held inside Middle School No. 1 in Beslan for 53 hours until Russian forces stormed the building.

Roksolana Tchotchieva, whose parents and younger sister live near Beslan in Ossetia, said every former resident of the area that she knows has been personally affected by events there.

The entire region will be in mourning for years, she said.

The official number of dead is 338 people, but Tchotchieva and many people from the region believe the number is actually much higher – anywhere from 600 to 1,000 people.

Eighteen children who survived the Beslan attack recently visited Israel. [Israpet]

Tchotchieva, a former Russian-language talk-show host and prominent artist who gave up a reporting position on a local Russian-language TV show to pursue her dream of teaching, said the Beslan massacre has left her fearful for her own students when she watches them innocently playing and enjoying life.

As a child, Tchotchieva visited her grandparents in Beslan almost every weekend, and she spent her summer and winter holidays in Beslan. "I knew that school... I know every brick the TV networks have shown," she said.

While it was once a peaceful small town, now "it's the town of the dead, the town where sorrow and pain will reside forever," she said.

Tchotchieva and her relatives don't know of any Jewish families in Beslan who were affected by the tragedy, and the Jewish Agency for Israel says the last Jewish family made aliyah more than six months ago.

Still, many in Toronto's Russian Jewish community had family and friends who were affected, Tchotchieva said, noting that Oleg Kantemirov, a circus performer from Ossetia who owns a school in Toronto called Wonderful World of Circus, flew to Beslan just after the crisis began.

His cousin is a schoolteacher who went missing during the siege. He and his relatives organized a fundraiser for victims and their families in Beslan, and people responded with tremendous generosity.

As well, Tchotchieva's best friend, 33-year-old Albina Batagova, is from Beslan. Batagova came to Canada several years ago and got married, while two children from a previous marriage remained in Beslan with her parents.

They both attended Middle School No. 1.

Batagova was eight months pregnant with her third child when she learned about the events in Beslan. She flew there and was able to locate her 13-year-old son Khetag, but she couldn't find 10-year-old Alana.

Shortly after returning to Toronto in October, Batagova gave birth to a healthy baby boy and learned the horrible news that her daughter's body was found and identified by relatives in Beslan.

Tchotchieva said that only the necessity of taking care of her newborn son kept Batagova going for the first few months after she received the news.

Meanwhile, Batagova's son was being hailed by his relatives as a hero for saving three young schoolkids from the burning school by jumping from a second-floor window.

Tchotchieva said it's impossible to imagine how Russian kids will head back to school next Sept. 1, the first day of school in Russia and the day the hostage crisis began.

The first day of school was a national holiday in the former Soviet Union and remains one in modern Russia. It's customary for boys to dress in their finest dark suits and white shirts, and for girls to wear pretty dresses and ribbons in their hair.

But a day normally filled with love, care, support and understanding will now be remembered for a terrorist massacre, Tchotchieva said.

Toronto's Russian community has opened a bank account to collect donations for Beslan. Donations can be made at any TD Canada Trust branch in Canada. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is also collecting donations for Beslan. For more information, call 416-635-2883, ext. 174.

As well, the Federation of Jewish Communities of the Commonwealth of Independent States is raising funds. For details, visit www.fjc.ru.

Discover the archeological sites of Tiberias

By EDGAR ASHER

Despite the dearth of tourists in the past few years because of the intifadah, Israel has been able to maintain its tourist infrastructure.

This year has shown a remarkable increase in the number of tourists coming to Israel, particularly from European countries, as well as a dramatic rise in the number of Christian visitors. A new air terminal opened at Ben-Gurion International Airport recently and cruise ships are slowly but steadily returning to Israel's Mediterranean ports.

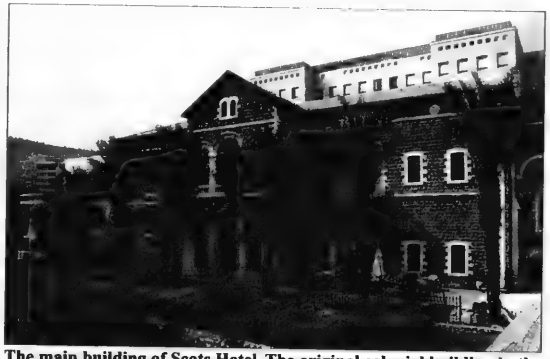
There is no doubt that internal tourism has saved many a tourist enterprise from closing. However, the number of new projects – hotels, transport links and tourist-related infrastructure – is a sure indication that investors, both in the private and government sectors, are showing confidence in the future of tourism in Israel. When it comes to investment, investors want to see a good return on their money, and, unquestionably, as far as they are concerned, the future of Israel tourism looks good.

Even in better times Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Eilat were the country's primary tourist destinations. Much effort is being made now to encourage visitors to spend more time in other parts of the country, and in particular, in the north.

In 1961, a hospice for pilgrims was established by the Church of Scotland in Tiberias, which in turn developed into a guest house. In 1999, the Church of Scotland General Assembly overwhelmingly adopted a proposal to further develop the site into a modern hotel. The plan went ahead and $16 million dollars was invested in the new "Scots Hotel." The 69-room hotel is one of the finest in the city and it is to be enlarged to 150 rooms. The expanded Scots Hotel will augment the already wide range of high quality hotels in the area.

The new, energetic mayor of Tiberias, Zohar Oved, is leading the battle to re-establish his city as one of the most dynamic historical locations in the country.

Tiberias always had its famous lake, the Sea of Galilee, a wide range of hotels and spas. Perhaps its most famous claim to fame, its archeology, remained deep under the ground, and for most of its visitors, the stories and legends of one of Israel's most historic places could only be found in books. "No more," says Oved. "We are now going to start showing people just how special Tiberias has been since biblical times for Jews and Christians alike."



The main building of Scots Hotel. The original colonial building in the foreground has been carefully preserved. [Edgar Asher photos]

All over Tiberias archeological digs can be seen, bringing to light the remains of bygone times – the Roman, Greek and Byzantine eras. The city takes its name from Caesar Tiberius and was named in his honour nearly 2,000 years ago by Herod Antipas.

Near the lakeside of Tiberias, an ancient synagogue has been excavated.

Tiberias has something for everyone all year round

The leader of the great Jewish revolt against the Romans, Rabbi Akiva (50-137 CE), was put on trial in Tiberias. He was convicted and sentenced to death there and his mausoleum can still be visited.

In the mishnaic and talmudic periods, Tiberias was an important spiritual centre. The Mishnah was compiled there in 200 CE, under the supervision of Rabbi Yehuda Ha-Nasi, and 200 years later the Jerusalem Talmud was also completed in the city.

Rambam is buried in Tiberias. The city will declare the year 2005 the International Year of the Rambam. The Rambam – Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon (Maimonides) – is one of Judaism's most respected and revered icons. It is the 800th anniversary of his death in 1205, and many events and symposia are planned to honour the memory of this remarkable man.

Tiberias has something for everyone all year round. Accommodation to suit all pocketbooks is available, and the city is an ideal spot from which to tour the Galilee and the Hermon regions.

The municipality and its hoteliers are confident that the tourists will continue to return in even greater numbers. And now, as the archeological searches become even more intense, the city's secrets are coming to life. Soon Tiberias will be a location not to missed when coming to Israel.

An ongoing major archaeological excavation in the south of Tiberias has revealed some of the earliest origins of the city.

Happy Chanukah

Abir Yaakob Congregation sits regally as the diadem in the crown of the Sephardic Kehilla Centre on Bathurst Street at the crossroads between North York and Thornhill.

Officially inaugurated in 1997, it is as much a gallery of inspiring art as it is a hallowed place of worship. The stained glass windows in the main sanctuary are a breathtakingly beautiful tour of Jewish life, lore and history.

Facing the Heychal (the Holy Ark) are a series of windows on the sanctuary's north wall that depict the Jewish experience in Spain and Morocco.

Below the cupola dome, also facing the Heychal, are windows depicting interwoven themes from the tribes of Israel, Sephardi communal life and elements of the human condition.

In these two facing pages, we can only present eight of the windows. They are, alas, merely a suggestion of the full splendour of the aesthetics and spiritual power of Abir Yaakob Congregation. But even as a suggestion, it is poignant evidence of man's magisterial ability to soar to heavenly realms when attempting to praise God and convey religious feeling.

The boy in the peak hat

By LARRY PALEF

Joseph Horowitz had just finished watching the fourth episode of the 1997 TV show, The Nazis: A Warning from History.

That 12-year-old boy in a close-up picture, one of the 160,000 Jewish concentration camp victims in Lodz, Poland, looked exactly like Joseph.

"Impossible," he said to himself. At that age, he'd never been to Poland. Born in Ottawa, Horowitz had visited Europe only after he retired from his grocery brokerage business five years earlier, on his 65th birthday.

That sad looking youngster appeared to be staring at Horowitz. The Polish kid was wearing the same jacket, pants and peak hat that Joseph had worn in a 1936 candid snapshot taken when he visited New York City.

The picture of Joseph and his mother had been taken by a street photographer as they walked along Lexington Avenue towards Macy's department store. For some inexplicable reason, that New York picture – nearly 70 years old – remained ingrained in his memory.

The mirror image of himself chilled his body. That Polish youngster at the age of about 12 was one of the six million murdered. Horowitz felt numb and surprisingly guilty that, at the very same time that he was heading to Macy's to buy a learner's accordion, his apparent double would be snuffed out of existence. A bullet would be his early bar mitzvah present.

In retirement, overweight at 200 pounds, Horowitz spent little time being active. Exercise within his apartment consisted of searching for his remote control unit or putting another disc inside his VCR-DVD machine. Outside his apartment, activity was driving to his bank or the dry cleaners, and shopping for fruit, vegetables and fresh shrimp and escargot.

He had sold his grocery brokerage business and had sufficient investment income to live comfortably and indulge in overeating, sleeping late and slipping into becoming the prototypical couch potato. That is until he became absorbed in the fourth episode of The Nazis: A Warning from History.

Horowitz was married for nearly 45 years to Helen Sherman, who was independently wealthy, having inherited a percentage of real estate holdings that had been her father's. She had separate quarters in their large, million-dollar condominium.

Sherman's interests involved playing mah-jong with fellow members from her ladies' social club, discussing fiction and non-fiction bestsellers at the club's luncheons and planning trips with her wide circle of widowed friends. Helen and Joseph, being childless, had learned to survive their marriage by ignoring each other's insular lifestyle.

The only time they yelled at each other was when Horowitz played the TV too loudly in his bedroom and when the telephone rang – each yelled at the other, practically in unison from their own widely separated bedrooms, saying, "You answer it. It's probably for you."

> 'For weeks... nightmares burned his brain'

Horowitz first became involved with the six-part series, The Nazis: A Warning from History, when he read about it in the Broadcast News section of the Globe and Mail. He always recorded programs that appealed to his senses. His intention was to put on disc all six episodes. But that fourth program still troubled him – more than the others. That boy looked like him, dressed like him. But it couldn't be him.

Still, he could not erase that sad 12-year-old Polish youngster from his subconscious. The picture of this lost life kept reappearing in his mind so frequently that he at first determined to do his own investigation and find out everything about him, especially his name.

"But why," he asked himself, "spend days searching for the name of this doomed soul?"

Instinctively he knew that by calling the program's production office and several Jewish agencies, he would eventually get some information. The European boy would be identified as coming from Lodz, Poland, and he would possess the Hebrew name of Yussel, which means Joseph. Why not? Everything else matched. Especially that grey peak hat. So why shouldn't their name be one and the same?

For weeks, Horowitz slept poorly. And when sleep eventually overtook him, nightmares burned his brain and cold sweat drained his body.

He dreamed of the time in Ottawa when he was made class monitor by his Grade 10 Glebe Collegiate teacher Mr.

'He heard in his subconscious a distant voice calling him'

Crandon. Crandon was called away suddenly by his principal for a meeting. So Joe was in charge of the class who, in seconds, were quite noisy and not attentive to their reading assignment. He told them to settle down, behave and be quiet. Then up spoke Elaine Chesley yelling in Joe's direction, "I'm not taking orders from any Jew." It was wartime. Ironically, her outburst hushed the class.

Sometimes he would get up from his sleepless nights, read some fiction and even browse through his sister Rose's scrapbook. Almost halfway through the book, he discovered that picture of himself wearing his peak hat and strolling down Lexington Avenue in New York City on March 19, 1936. His brother Charlie held the wrapped accordion under his arm, and Joe's mother walked in the middle, between them.

There were wartime photographs from the Ottawa Citizen and the Journal of prime ministers Winston Churchill and William Lyon Mackenzie King.

Horowitz remembered being wakened by his mother one Saturday morning in Ottawa. She told him that if he hurried and got dressed, he'd be in time to go to Union Station and catch Churchill's arrival. Joe thanked his mom and decided his sleep was more important.

At that period during World War II, Churchill had returned from his conference with President Franklin Delano Roosevelt in Washington, where plans were framed for unifying Allied strategy for the defeat of the Axis. Later during that same visit, Churchill addressed the Canadian House of Commons and the Senate.

> He wanted a life of sharing, of giving back to the community

Other scrapbook pictures showed many of the young enlisted Jewish men from Ottawa who fought for freedom in World War II. Some returned home. Others, unfortunately, did not. Like 23-year-old pilot Sgt. Herbert Wolf who was missing in action and eventually was buried at Sidi Barrani in Libya, pilot officer Hy Abrams who crashed overseas, Luke Abelson, Moe Zumar, and the list goes on – including Bruce Pollack who was Joe's homeroom teacher at Glebe Collegiate. Pollack's plane hit a seawall in India.

Some others who came back to Canada's capital from the conflict and were pictured in Rose's scrapbook were Sgt. David Molot, quartermaster Sgt. David Kronick and pilot officer Sam Berger, who was a popular barrister and once was president of the Ottawa Football Club.

Finally, one night after falling asleep from exhaustion, he heard in his subconscious a distant voice calling him. It sounded like his own voice, saying, "Who am I? Am I living a life worthy of who I am?" And the voice kept echoing, "What is it that I should do and want in this life? Wherein lies my passion?"

He awakened refreshed, feeling a spiritual fullness. As if the soul within him had come alive and stripped him of his lethargy.

His social consciousness was raised to an unbelievable level. A strong sense of urgency overtook him. He wanted a life of sharing, of giving back to the community during his remaining years.

Horowitz had expertise in the grocery business and he decided to become active in the food drives for the needy – the city's unfortunates, the young and the old homeless souls. And so he became pro-active in food drives, as a beginning.

Horowitz was outwardly not a religious person. Yet he felt the innate goodness of man's Creator had touched his deep inner self. Driven by the warmth of compassion, he wanted to create that feeling in others.

He walked toward his TV and VCR-DVD player and replayed the fourth episode of The Nazis: A Warning from History.

Despite the passage of so many years, Horowitz's deep desire was to connect with little Yussel through the medium of television and sincerely express his compassion to just one of the six million victims. If – if – if only he could.

He played the sequence again and again, forward and backward, but the pale little 12-year-old Polish boy in the peak hat had disappeared from the close-up scene.

The Ostrys: a legacy of accomplishment in public life

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Sylvia and Bernard Ostry are an exceptional Jewish couple, says book publishing consultant Malcolm Lester of Malcolm Lester and Associates.

"They are one of a kind in terms of their joint accomplishments in Canadian public service," adds Lester, who has been a consultant on their recently published books.

Both of the Ostrys are respected around the world. Sylvia is an economist, trade negotiator and policy expert, while Bernard is a former high-ranking federal and provincial civil servant in the areas of culture and broadcasting.

A one-of-a kind, high-powered couple, they are the only husband and wife in public service who have served as deputy ministers in Canada. Between them, they have worked with six Canadian prime ministers.

Listings for Sylvia and Bernard can be found in Who's Who, both Canadian and American editions, as well as at the International Biographic Centre. There are hundreds of entries on the Internet that note their publications and accomplishments.

Sylvia holds a PhD from McGill and Cambridge universities, along with 14 honorary doctorates. She is a companion of the Order of Canada and is the chancellor emeritus of the University of Waterloo.

Sylvia was born in Winnipeg and Bernard was born in the small farming community of Wadena, Sask., where his father ran a general store.

Bernard says he was sent to live in a Jewish orphanage in Winnipeg for several years "so that I could read the Torah for my bar mitzvah."

Sylvia and Bernard met at public school in Winnipeg. Bernard attended high school in Flin Flon, graduated from the University of Manitoba and went to England to teach international history at the University of London.

At a time when it was rare for women to be accepted into premed studies, Sylvia was admitted on the basis of her high marks. But after one year, she says, "I found it wasn't intellectual – it was boring. I found economics stimulating."

She was eventually offered a teaching position at Oxford University. Once in Oxford, she says she decided to call Bernard at the University of London. They became reacquainted and the rest is history.

It was during their stay in England that their first son, Adam, was born. Juggling child-care responsibilities with her career, the sought-after expert in the field of economics returned to Canada. She says, "It was [former prime minister Pierre] Trudeau who made me the first female deputy [minister] when he offered me [a position with] Statistics Canada." She entered the public service at a time when few women could penetrate the senior ranks.

In 1975, she became the deputy minister of Corporate Affairs Canada and deputy registrar general. Three years later, she became the chair of the Economics Council of Canada.

In 1979, Sylvia was invited to Paris to head the department of economics and statistics of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). She refused the offer, saying, "It is impossible for me to leave Canada." But Bernard convinced her to go.

Sylvia and Bernard Ostry

'Agreed to help ORT...to do something here as well as in Israel'

She is the first woman ever to hold the post at the OECD. During her five years with the organization, she was recognized for her extraordinary knowledge and her ability in international negotiations.

"My career would not have taken off without the support of my husband," she says.

She returned to Canada to become deputy minister of International Trade Canada.

Bernard proudly spoke of his wife's work on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and her role as former prime minister Brian Mulroney's personal ambassador of multilateral trade negotiations at a G7 Economic Summit.

She is now the distinguished research fellow at the Munk Centre for International Studies at the University of Toronto.

Bernard returned to Canada from England in the 1960s, where he held positions in Ottawa with the Research Council of Canada and deputy ministerial positions in both federal and provincial governments, where he was responsible for citizenship programs and communications, and later, industry and tourism.

In 2002, Sylvia had a brain aneurysm. With great emotion, Bernard recalled his wife's near-death illness and her miraculous recovery.

Bernard's love of art and culture drew him to associations with the Royal Ontario Museum, the McMichael Canadian Collection and the Art Gallery of Ontario. He has served as the secretary general of the National Museums of Canada.

The Royal Ontario Museum has published a book on Bernard's Art Deco furniture. He has donated a collection of 17th- and 18th-century furniture to Government House in Ottawa and has made other significant donations to museums and art galleries.

For many years, Bernard was the chair and chief executive officer of TVOntario, retiring in 1992.

Along with his long record of public service, Bernard, who was named to the Order of Canada, has been involved in publishing.

Recently, he assisted with the publication of The Sterling Public Servant: A Global Tribute to Sylvia Ostry; At the Global Crossroads: The Sylvia Ostry Foundations Lectures (six lectures, given annually, which explore the global economy); and Visions of Canada, The Alan Plaunt Memorial Lectures 1958-1992, co-edited by Bernard. The three books are from McGill-Queen's University Press.

Bernard is currently finishing a book on aboriginals titled Victims No More: Short Bios of Successful Native Peoples. He says, "I hope to change the image and perceptions of these people."

The Ostrys have supported many Jewish causes, including ORT, for which they served as honorary presidents.

Ten years ago, the Ostrys were asked to become involved with the organization. "Because we are very interested in education, we agreed to help transform ORT into a more Canadian institution – to do something here as well as in Israel."

Reflecting on her life, Sylvia said she considers herself very lucky. "We have had a wonderful relationship and we have two great boys, both in public service, and two grandsons."

Their son Adam is a political scientist in Ottawa and his brother Jonathan is an economist in Washington.

Novelist Naomi Ragen's own life inspires her

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For novelist Naomi Ragen, art imitates life. Virtually all her books, from Jephte's Daughter, her first, to The Covenant, her latest, spring from first-hand experience."It's all inside me," said Ragen, who was here recently as the guest of the Jewish Book Fair.

An American who adopted an Orthodox lifestyle when she was just a girl, and who has lived in Israel since 1971, she rarely requires the benefit of intensive research. Her topics and themes are invariably of second nature to her.

Consider Jephte's Daughter – a novel about a wealthy American Jewish businessman and scion of an important Orthodox family who forces his beautiful and intelligent daughter into an arranged marriage – and two almost thematically parallel novels, The Sacrifice of Tamar and Sotah.

Similarly, she was on home turf when she wrote Chains Around the Grass – a portrait of an American Jewish family coping with a tragedy – and The Covenant, which turns on a terrorist incident in Jerusalem, where she has lived since making aliyah.

The Covenant was inspired by real events. In 1994, a year after the start of the Oslo peace process, Ragen's neighbour's son, an Israeli soldier named Nachson Wachsman, was murdered after being kidnapped by Palestinians.

Six years later, the second intifadah erupted a stone's throw away from her house in Ramot.

And in 2002, Ragen and her family were at the Park Hotel, in Netanya, when a suicide bomber blew it up, killing 29 Israelis at a seder meal and touching off Israel's occupation of Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank.

Naomi Ragen

Five minutes before the bomber struck with such devastating force, Ragen and her husband, Alex, left the seder table and went up to their room. "I had this vision something bad would happen," she said. And then they heard a deafening boom, which, in a flash, shattered their windows.

As they vacated the hotel, walking on floors covered in a mixture of water and fresh blood, they saw a dazed, bloodied waitress. Once they were outside, they glanced through a window, the sight of broken chairs and a reddish white tablecloth coming into their line of vision.

Miraculously, her husband's parents survived without a scratch, a column having protected them from the fiery blast.

'Blunt and forceful, Ragen is no shrinking violet'

Being a natural observer, Ragen incorporated some of the gory details into The Covenant. "If you want to know what's going on in Israel, read this book, don't read the newspaper," she said in a flourish of self-promotion.

Only once, in the case of The Ghost of Hannah Mendes, has Ragen not been forced to draw on her own life for inspiration. That novel portrays a family's search for its Sephardi roots and summons up the ghost of a remarkable ancestor, a Portuguese businesswoman who helps Jews during the Inquisition.

"I needed five years, and trips to Spain, to research The Ghost of Hanna Mendes," disclosed Ragen.

Ragen, a 55-year-old mother of four who has been a grandmother six times over, was born in an ethnically mixed, low-income neighbourhood in New York City.

Her parents were non-observant. "I don't even think we kept kashrut," she recalled. But when she was six or seven, her mother sent her to an Orthodox day school in a safer area, and Ragen was transformed. "I decided to become observant."

In the third grade, she won a gold charm in a writing contest, and was smitten. "The process of turning a blank piece of paper into a piece of gold had me hooked, and I never looked back." Not surprisingly, she gravitated toward English literature while pursuing a BA degree at Brooklyn College.

Although they had never visited Israel, she and her husband immigrated to Israel. "We wanted to be there because it's the Jewish homeland. Things were not always easy, but it was the best decision we ever made."

Ragen completed an MA in English at the Hebrew University, submitting a thesis on the British master D.H. Lawrence. In the meantime, she had turned to freelance journalism, churning out columns and articles for, among other publications, The Jerusalem Post and Hadassah magazine. "I had to earn a living."

After 20 years of effort, Ragen finally produced a novel, and she knew it was publishable. "I'm a pretty good judge of writing." But it was not until she met an American book editor in Jerusalem did she strike pay dirt.

She still remembers the incandescent moment when she was told that her manuscript had been accepted by the same publisher that had previously rejected her. "It was like a fairy tale," she gushed, "every writer's dream."

Her career has been quite lucrative, 500,000 copies of her books having been published in English, Hebrew, German, Swedish, Norwegian and Portuguese and some having been optioned for Hollywood movies.

And now, her first play, Women's Quorum, based on a true story about a haredi woman who stumbles upon her unfaithful husband's affair, has gone into its third year at the Habimah Theatre in Tel Aviv.

Blunt and forceful, Ragen is no shrinking violet. Through her books and website (http://www.NaomiRagen.com), she crusades for the egalitarian treatment of men and women in Orthodox Judaism. "God looks upon women as equals," she observed tartly.

And where political matters are concerned, she is an outspoken hawk. "The conflict with the Palestinians is a religious and cultural one, and has nothing to do with land. The Palestinians want Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem, not only the West Bank and the Gaza Strip."

Self-determination will not satisfy them, she claimed. "After Oslo, the whole concept of a Palestinian state is phony. If that's what the Palestinians really wanted, we could have had peace. But they want us dead and out of the Middle East."

She opposes Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan for a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza. "I have tremendous respect for Sharon, but he's making the mistake of his life."

Politics, however, is not the subject of Ragen's next novel.

Revolving around a rabbi's wife, it is set in the United States and unfolds against the backdrop of prosperous Orthodox Jews paying only lip service to keeping faith with their religious life.

In that sense, Ragen will be on familiar ground, yet again.

Music pioneer Leonard Chess profiled in Machers and Rockers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Machers and Rockers (W.W. Norton & Company), Rich Cohen's brief but richly evocative biography of Leonard Chess, chronicles one of the great, unheralded figures in the pantheon of American music.

A tough, rough-hewn Polish Jew whose family immigrated to the United States in 1928, Chess, first known as Lezjor Czyz, was the prime mover behind Chicago-based Chess Records.

In its heyday, from 1948 to 1968, it released a succession of blues classics, including Can't Be Satisfied by Muddy Waters, Rocket 88 by Ike Turner, At Last by Etta James, I'm A Man by Bo Didley and Maybellene by Chuck Berry.

Chess, whose success was due to his business acumen and his musical taste, was a larger-than-life figure whose cigar-chomping contemporaries ranged from Sid Nathan to Hy Weiss, the respective founders of King Records and Bang Records.

Muddy Waters

Say what you will about Chess' vulgar personality, but according to Cohen, he and his coterie of blues musicians virtually invented and promoted the very idea of rock 'n' roll.

Chess, who spoke English with a heavy Yiddish accent, started his ascent in his father's junk business.

In 1945, he took a job in a liquor store in a black neighbourhood, where he learned how to speak the local vernacular.

Borrowing money from his father, he opened a nightclub – the Macomba Lounge – four years later. When it occurred to him there was more money to be made in the recording industry, Chess Records was born.

Leonard Chess

In the early years, he was a one-man show, personally distributing his wares from the trunk of his Cadillac sedan. As time passed, Chess Records became a going concern, releasing about 200 new records a year.

After cornering the market in blues, Chess expanded into soul, gospel and jazz. In 1959, he bought the first of five radio stations, and in the process, he helped invent the concept of modern black radio, we're told.

He sold Chess Records in 1968, having assembled the greatest catalogue in the history of the blues and having assisted in ushering in the age of rock 'n' roll.

Chess died relatively young, but he made his mark. And in Machers and Rockers, Cohen– a fine writer who can turn a phrase – pays ample tribute to this pioneer.

Remembering Israel's first computer

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

When young Princeton engineer Jerry Estrin arrived in Haifa on a slow immigrant boat in late 1953 to build the Middle East's first computer, he faced just two problems.

There were no parts or tools, from vacuum tubes to soldering irons, available in Israel, and there was no staff, trained or otherwise.

Now, when Israel's sophisticated high-tech industry barely remembers its electronic progenitor, Estrin and a few old-timers are quietly marking the 50th anniversary of the WEIZAC computer, its closet-sized mainframe and some 3,000 vacuum tubes resting in a corner of the Weizmann Institute of Science.

What allowed the seemingly impossible project to succeed, Estrin recalled recently at his home in Santa Monica, Calif., was the can-do optimism and improvisational genius of Israelis, just five years after they had established their state.

Granted, Estrin had a few allies. One was his wife Thelma, who, like him, had a PhD in electrical engineering from the University of Wisconsin.

Both had worked for three years with John von Neumann, the principal architect of the computer age, at the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton. When they left for Israel, von Neumann presented them with complete plans and specifications for the Princeton IAS computer.

On the Rehovot campus of the Weizmann Institute, the legendary mathematician and geophysicist Chaim Pekeris had proposed a computer as early as 1946 for such complex projects as determining the world's tides and delving into atomic physics.

At the time, Albert Einstein, a member of Pekeris' advisory committee, asked, "Why should poor Palestine build an electronic computer when there is hardly one in operation on the European continent?"

Einstein was finally persuaded and the fledgling Weizmann Institute allotted $50,000 (US), then one-fifth of its total budget, to the computer project.

The other chief backer was Meyer Weisgal, who had taken over the leadership of the institute from Chaim Weizmann. A peerless fund-raiser, Weisgal came up with $100,000, through one judicious phone call, to purchase the computer's magnetic core memory.

The Estrins, New York natives who recently marked their 62nd wedding anniversary, settled in Rehovot with their daughter Margo, who was 10 months old.

"My first priority was to hire a staff and then train them in the redesign, testing and fabrication of the computer," Estrin recalled. He placed an ad in a newspaper and right away ran into another unanticipated problem.

Almost all the job applicants were postwar immigrants whose educational and employment records had been lost in the Holocaust. To winnow down the applicants, Estrin devised some simple tests to gauge their knowledge and aptitude.

In short order, Estrin put together a core staff of three full-time engineers, a technician and a cleaning woman, who also was put in charge of punch cards. The group was augmented by a few part-time technicians.

Ingenuity was needed to scrounge or devise parts for the WEIZmann Automatic Computer, or WEIZAC. For instance, Estrin and his team needed extremely thin copper strips, but were stuck until they discovered a shack, surrounded by goats and chickens, where two recent Bulgarian immigrants had set up shop to make parts for fans and bicycles. The Bulgarians adapted their stamping machines to produce the copper strips.

Fifteen months after the Estrins arrived, WEIZAC, built at a bargain-basement cost of $200,000, was beginning to function. The family, augmented by a second daughter, Judith, born in Tel Aviv, had to return to the United States.

After further tests, WEIZAC went online in 1955, and after eight years and 46,000 hours of service, was retired in 1963.

Over the next decade, Estrin returned to Israel every two years to consult on WEIZAC's successor computer, appropriately named the Golem. In 1971, he organized the First International Jerusalem Conference on Information Technology, where he presented a digitized portrait of Golda Meir to the then-prime minister herself.

"The WEIZAC project drove me to make a contribution beyond my dreams," Estrin, now 82, reminisced.

Building a team and heading a project in the Israeli work environment wrought changes in Estrin's mild-mannered personality.

"I learned how to pound tables, which stood me in good stead when later I became chairman of the UCLA computer science department," he said with a half-smile.

"But I really fell in love with the people and if it had been up to my wife, we would have stayed," he added.

Estrin's legacy to Israel has been long-lasting. By building its own computer in the face of widespread skepticism, Israel "got into the information revolution early in the game," he said.

Perhaps most important, WEIZAC spawned a cadre of engineers and technicians who, with their successors, went on to staff the country's high-tech industry and top academic institutions.

The contributions of the two WEIZAC pioneers have been honoured and perpetuated through the Estrin Family Chair in Computer Science at the Weizmann Institute, on whose board of governors Estrin served for more than two decades.

A year after they returned to the United States, UCLA asked both Estrins to join its faculty, Jerry as a professor to build a program in computer engineering and Thelma as a pioneer developer of computer applications in brain research.

The Estrins have left a legacy of another kind through their three high-achieving daughters. They also have four grandchildren.

Judith has become a Silicon Valley icon, founding four companies and now serving as president and CEO of Packet Design, which develops networking technology. She has been named three times in Fortune magazine's list of the 50 most powerful women in American business.

Deborah, the youngest daughter, is a computer science professor at UCLA and founding director of the Center for Embedded Network Sensing, which last year received a $40 million grant over 10 years from the U.S. National Science Foundation.

Only Margo, who was part of the WEIZAC period as an infant, broke the family tradition by becoming a doctor of internal medicine, practising in the San Francisco area.

Learn Yiddish with new songbook and CD

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

All of his life, lawyer Muni Basman has loved the Yiddish language.

The oldest son of the late teacher, Leybel Basman, he grew up in a home surrounded with the richness of Yiddish music and literature.

When Muni realized that his children knew very little Yiddish, he wanted to find a way to make it simple for them and others to learn the language.

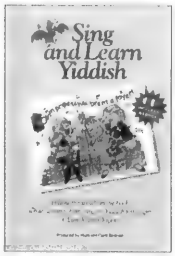
He recalled that when he was growing up in the north end of Winnipeg, his high school had half Ukrainian students and half Jewish students. The Ukrainian students taught him their songs, and he says he still knows some 100 Ukrainian and Russian words "because of the songs I learned when I was a kid."

When he moved to Toronto, he had a friend from South America who taught him Spanish songs, "and they stuck in my memory until today."

Using this model, Basman took 18 Yiddish songs by different performers, put them on a cassette and wrote out the words in transliteration for his daughter Davida and his grandchildren.

"I calculated that if I could teach them 18 Yiddish songs they would have a Yiddish vocabulary of some 500 words and [an idea of] how the words and phrases go together.

"Then, when I discovered that the model worked, I decided to create an original CD."



Recently, Muni and his wife Carol Basman produced a book of 18 Yiddish folksongs and a CD to accompany the book, titled Sing and Learn Yiddish. The songs include such favorites as Oyfn Pripetchik, (In the Fireplace) Dona Dona and Oyfn Veg Shtet A Boym (On the Road Stands a Tree).

The book clearly sets out the Yiddish words of the songs in transliteration. There is also an English translation for each separate Yiddish word and a translation of the entire song in grammatical English. To help the novice, there are transliteration charts and other suggestions for learning pronunciations, brief instruction guides and quizzes.

The words are sung by Vancouver's Claire Klein Osipov, who is renowned for her dramatic interpretation of Yiddish folksongs and her live concerts. She has also directed children's choirs, appeared on radio and television and has made several recordings.

Oscar Ross, a folksinger and artist who performed with the original Travellers, designed the attractive, easy-to-follow 79-page book.

Ken Borden, who operates an ad agency, Borden Advertising/Marketing Inc., illustrated the songs in a delightfully whimsical style that adds a fun element to the book.

Basman says others assisting with the development and publishing of the book and CD, included musicians Wendy Bross Stuart, piano accompanist, and Niv Kaufman, accordionist, who were co-arrangers; percussionist Martin Fisk and recording engineer Stuart Tarbuck.

For children and adults who only want to learn to sing the songs in Yiddish, as well as those who want to learn the meaning of the words or improve their Yiddish skills, the Basmans have made it an easy and fun way for individuals or groups to enjoy themselves while they learn or improve their Yiddish.

"Music is a wonderful tool for learning another language," says Sharon Hampson of Sharon, Lois and Bram. "People have frequently used our music to teach English as a second language and now I look forward to improving my Yiddish with this delightful collection of songs and text."

Sing and Learn Yiddish has a website (www.singandlearnyiddish.com), which is a delight and gives viewers an opportunity to see a sample of how the book works.

Basman has dedicated Sing and Learn Yiddish to the memory of his father and mother.

For a copy of Sing and Learn Yiddish, call Muni Basman, 416-960-3333, toll free 1-866-960-3334, or fax 416-962-5222.

Book looks at Jewish child's conflicting emotions at Christmas

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Two forces propelled Sarah Hartt-Snowbell to write generally, and to write the children's book, Yesterday's Santa and the Chanukah Miracle specifically.

The 62-year-old Thornhill grandmother freely admits she dropped out of high school and hated reading.

Sarah Hartt-Snowbell

Even as an adult, she had difficulty getting through big books. It was only after scaling the 870-page Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix last year that Hartt-Snowbell got some traction with the printed word.

Hartt-Snowbell empathizes with those who share her one-time plight. So, as the published author puts it, "I write for the reluctant reader."

As for Yesterday's Santa (Napoleon Publishing), a sweet and poignant look at a child's conflicting emotions this time of year, when Chanukah and Christmas inevitably collide, Hartt-Snowbell was motivated by personal experience.

"Picture this," she tells The CJN in the style of a storyteller with a tale to tell. "It's December 1952, a cold, winter day in Montreal. I'm 10 years old. I put on my hat and coat and mittens, and head to a friend's house. And there in the living room was the most beautiful Christmas tree I ever saw. The lights, the tinsel, the whole thing… And that whole Christmas feeling was all over the neighbourhood.

"I have to admit, I was jealous. And you don't have to be Orthodox, Conservative or Reform to have that feeling. When you're surrounded by a Christian holiday, it can be overwhelming."

There's a lot of "Christmas envy" among Jewish children, she believes, evidenced by tales – perhaps apocryphal – of "Chanukah bushes."

Even so, North American Jews have folded many Christmas traditions into Chanukah, such as gift-giving (often preceded by frantic last-minute shopping) and colourful decorations.

For little Annie, the central character in Yesterday's Santa, this time of year can lead to torn feelings.

Her parents find out. "Can you explain to us, Annie, why Chanukah and Christmas are having such a big fight inside your head?" her mother queries.

"It's mostly because of the lights and decorations," Annie sheepishly replies. "Everything's so sparkly and pretty."

And, she adds, everybody's always asking her whether she's all set for Christmas. "So I end up saying 'yes,' 'cause I don't know what else to say."

There's another parallel plot line that helps reinforce the message, but to telescope, Annie learns that Chanukah isn't really about presents and bunting, but about religious freedom and that it's okay to be different.

Her ultimate lesson, received gently and sensitively, is that Chanukah is about miracles, both big and small.

As for anyone who might bristle at the word "Santa" in the book's title, Hartt-Snowbell summons the adage not to judge a book by its cover.

She concedes that some eyebrows have been raised. "I really wish people would go beyond the title before condemning me," she says. "I challenge anyone who challenges me."

Hartt-Snowbell's creative light was kindled when she became a grandmother, thinking that gave her license to write for children. Her initial efforts were rudimentary, so she signed up for a course on writing for children at George Brown College.

"They taught us that dialogue brings the story to life."

Two years later, her first book, A Little Something, was published.

This year, a short story, Aggie, was included in an anthology of winning entries in a short story contest sponsored by the Canadian Authors Association.

The icing on the cake is that Yesterday's Santa has been made into an animated film for television.

The characters may look different than the book's rich drawings by Patty Gallinger, but the effect, accomplished by a method called animé, combines fluid realism that retains a cartoon-ish feel. It's every bit as heartwarming as the book.

It airs Dec. 27 at 7 p.m. on the premiere of CBC Television's Winter Tales.

My first trip to Israel won't be my last

By GILLIAN FARBER

"Aren't you afraid? Are you sure you want to do this? Isn't it dangerous?" These were only a few of the questions I was asked when I told my friends that my family and I were planning to visit Israel.

"It's a risk," many of them said.

But my reply always stayed the same, "It's a risk worth taking."

I am 17 years old, and going into my senior year of high school. This past July, my family and I went to Israel on an organized trip through the United Jewish Communities in New York City.

Israel is unique. It is hard to find words to describe the feeling – but beautiful, welcoming, warm and unbelievable is a good start.

My story begins on a hot summer morning when we arrived in Tel Aviv and ends almost a month later, with what turned out to be a scary drive to the Ben-Gurion Airport.

It was 6:30 a.m. when we descended the stairs of the airplane to the Tarmac of the airport. It was already 25 degrees Celsius. I didn't mind, though, because I went to Israel with three priorities: getting a tan, shopping and trying real Israeli foods. We arrived at our hotel and I was dead tired. The seven-hour time difference definitely put a spin on things, but after a nice long rest, my two younger brothers and I sat on our balcony looking down at the busy streets of Tel Aviv.

At first, Israel was intimidating because we were in a foreign country where not many people speak our language, but with practice and help from my parents, speaking Hebrew wasn't the hardest part. "Slichah" meaning "sorry/excuse me" and "todah" meaning "thank you" were the two basic words that got us through each day.

The second day in Israel was when things really started happening. I was introduced to everyone on the tour and started to interact with teens my age from across the United States. Our days were filled to the max with new and exciting activities that really drained us. There were days when we had to wake up as early as 6 a.m. and didn't return to the hotel until 9 p.m. I easily drifted off to sleep each night, happily awaiting the next day's adventures.

In the morning, we ate a big Israeli-style buffet breakfast to prepare us for the long day ahead. By now, it already felt as if I had been there for weeks! There is so much to do in Israel, in such a little country. It was hard to believe that Israel is the same size as Lake Ontario, but it makes sense, since we travelled from Tel Aviv, east to Jerusalem and then north to Haifa in just a few hours.

One day was an especially important one for my whole family. We went to plant a tree in the Lavi Forest up north. Planting a tree in the land of Israel is like leaving a piece of yourself there forever. And this was a special tree. We planted it in memory of my aunt, who had died of breast cancer shortly before we left for our trip. Planting the tree was an unforgettable experience and something that will remain forever in my heart.

Happy Chanukah

'Especially moved by Yad Vashem'

We took the rest of the day to return to Jerusalem, where I had my very first view of the holy city. It was absolutely amazing. Standing on Mount Scopus looking at the beautiful view of Jerusalem, I saw the past, present and future all at once. This was when I realized that Israel is my home.

The next week we went from the north of Israel to the south, seeing just about everything possible. My first visit to the Kotel – Jerusalem's Western Wall of the destroyed holy Temple – was a very emotional experience filled with much meaning and happiness.

Over the next few days, we got to ride camels and we walked around Masada. There, more than 1,000 years ago, a brave band of Jews defied Roman rule till they were overtaken in a battle. At the end, the Jews all committed suicide rather than become slaves to the Romans. We also went on Jeep rides up the Golan Heights, floated in the Dead Sea and participated in an archeological dig, at which I found an ancient camel bone.

I was especially moved by our visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum. Seeing it for the first time was definitely hard, but worthwhile.

Sooner than I wanted, the tour came to an end. I had learned that in just 10 days, adventures can occur, lessons can be learned and lifelong friendships can be made. Hugging our friends goodbye was one of the hardest things I had to do because for just 10 days I had shared something so personal with them.

After the tour, we stayed an extra seven days in Tel Aviv, and for the last week of our visit, we stayed with our family in a small town just outside of Jerusalem. That gave us the opportunity to live like Israelis.

On our last night in Israel, we found ourselves on the highway, heading to the airport. Our heads were filled with wonderful thoughts of our time together in Israel.

Then my brother noticed two shadows in the distance. There was a strange flash of light around them. My father thought it was probably just soldiers with flares. Astonishingly, as we drew closer, so did the light. It turned out to be homemade bombs called Molotov cocktails.

In a flash, they were hurled right above our car and exploded on the highway in front of us. My father drove around the flames, and thankfully, we managed to avoid damage to the rental car and ourselves. However, this terrifying experience opened our eyes to the reality that Israelis have to endure every day.

Nevertheless, this shocking incident didn't change our feelings about Israel. In fact, it solidified in our minds that we must all stand up to terrorism. We cannot be frightened away and let the terrorists win. We were happy to spend a month of our summer in Israel, where we literally experienced just about everything.

This trip was not only inspiring but it also gave me a different view of cultures, religious beliefs and life itself. I discovered that similar to its national cactus-like plant, the sabra, Israel and Israelis are tough on the outside but sweet on the inside.

It was my first trip to Israel and it will certainly not be my last.

Canada's shift at UN 'promising'

'A modest first step,' CIC says

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

"A modest but promising first step" is how the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) described last week's changes to this country's United Nations votes on resolutions affecting Israel

Jewish advocacy groups praised Canada's shift in favour of Israel on two key UN resolutions last week as a long-needed correction that will better reflect Canada's traditionally balanced approach to the Middle East.

But Ottawa's move, trumpeted by the media as a major policy shift, came at the same time as it decided to support a resolution that targets Israel for criticism. The CIC said Ottawa's support for that measure, dealing with Israel's nuclear capability, is "problematic" because it singles out the Jewish state.

Privately, some Jewish officials said Canada took with one hand just as it gave with the other, but they added that the real significance of the changes in the country's UN voting is that it will give Canadian diplomacy more credibility in the region.

Allan Rock
Canada's UN ambassador

And many in the Jewish community who are tired of one-sided UN votes were buoyed by an unexpectedly sharp denunciation of the UN by Canada's ambassador to the world body, Allan Rock, who said its Mideast resolutions are "divisive and lack balance."

In a Nov. 30 speech to the General Assembly, Rock said resolutions on the Middle East often overlook references to Israeli security, and added, without referring to Palestinians directly: "Repeatedly emphasizing Israel's responsibility under international law obscures equally important responsibilities of other parties to the conflict. This is a major shortcoming of the process."

Rock said Canada would oppose two measures on which it had abstained in the past. One deals with Israeli practices affecting Palestinian human rights, and the other focuses on the work of a committee on the "inalienable" right of Palestinians to mobilize support for their cause.

News in Brief

CANADA

Bush Hails Cdn. Role

HALIFAX — America welcomes a greater Canadian role in the Mideast peace process, U.S. President George W. Bush said during his state visit to Canada last week. "We will stand with the Palestinian and Israeli peoples and help end the destructive conflict between them," Bush said in Halifax. "Prime Minister [Paul] Martin has expressed the desire of his government to take a broader role in the quest for peace and democracy, and America welcomes your involvement."

WORLD

Jewish School Raided

CARACAS — A Jewish school in Caracas, Venezuela, was raided by security officials last week, causing panic among children and parents. Local and international Jewish groups expressed outrage over the way the investigation was conducted during the Monday morning raid. Police reportedly searched the school of 1,500 children for arms, based on accusations Israeli intelligence was connected with the recent assassination of federal prosecutor Danilo Anderson. The American Jewish Committee called on Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez to apologize to the Jewish community.

Police Protect Event

PARIS — Riot police armed with water cannons were on hand to prevent hundreds of pro-Palestinian protesters from storming a Jewish event in Paris. Some 400 pro-Palestinian demonstrators protested a gala evening last Monday organized by the French arm of the Jewish National Fund to raise money to build picnic areas near Israeli army bases. One of the groups, the Joint Appeal for a Just Peace in the Middle East, had appealed to a Paris court to ban the event, which took place at a well-known Paris theatre. The court ruled against the group and ordered it to pay $1,200 (US) in costs to JNF.

Looted Art Returned

LONDON — A Rembrandt drawing looted by the Nazis is being voluntarily returned to the descendants of its pre-World War II owners. The anonymous U.S. owner of The Liberation of Saint Peter From Prison is returning the drawing to Israeli Uri Peled, Reuters reported. Peled is a descendant of Arthur Feldmann, who had 700 artworks looted in 1939.

Hebrew TV – in Iran

TEHRAN — Iranian TV aired an anti-Israel drama – in Hebrew. The miniseries shown by the Sahar 1 channel during the Muslim festival of Ramadan last month purported to expose an "Israeli plot" to kill Palestinian girls using booby-trapped dolls. Several scenes show "Captain Shimon" and other Israeli troops, played by Iranian actors talking in pidgin Hebrew, the Middle East Media Research Institute said.

Inhumane Slaughter?

NEW YORK — A radical vegetarian group has accused a leading U.S. kosher meat processor of using inhumane slaughtering methods. People for the Equal Treatment of Animals released a video that it says shows slaughterers at AgriProcessors Inc. in Postville, Iowa, which markets meat under the Rubashkin/Aaron's Best label, violating slaughter laws and Halachah because they do not instantly kill the animals. Nathan Lewin, a lawyer for the firm, told the New York Sun that "all PETA wants to do is inflame the public against kosher slaughter." PETA has caused controversy in the past by comparing the meat industry to the Holocaust.

Hotel Reopens

NAIROBI — The Israeli-owned Paradise Hotel in Mombassa, Kenya, which was hit by suicide bombers in 2002, reopened for business last week, exactly two years after 12 people were killed in a triple suicide bombing. The crime, widely attributed to Al Qaeda, remains formally unsolved.

Writing Contest

NEW YORK — Three $1,000 (US) prizes can be won in the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education's 16th annual creative writing contest for authors 18 to 35. Writers must submit an original short story of up to 5,000 words by Dec. 31. Details at 212-268-4210 or www.caje.org.

VISA CAL Hires 'Spy'

TEL AVIV — A suspected Mossad spy who had been jailed for passport fraud in New Zealand is now a credit-card executive with Israel's VISA CAL company, Yediot Achronot reported. Eli Cara became the firm's deputy general manager two months after he completed a three-month prison term in Auckland for trying to obtain a passport by assuming the identity of a bedridden New Zealander. The firm had no comment on Wellington's allegations that Cara and two Israeli accomplices were Mossad agents.

Security Best Left to Israelis, OU Says

JERUSALEM — At its annual meeting in Jerusalem last month, the Orthodox Union expressed empathy with settlers facing eviction from Gaza and parts of the West Bank, but said security issues are best left to Israeli citizens and leaders.

An OU resolution said that "so many in our community feel [a profound identification] with the plight of Jews who face removal from their homes in areas that resonate in Jewish history, and where their presence was encouraged and supported by the State of Israel." But the OU acknowledged "that questions of Israeli foreign policy and domestic security are best left to the citizens of Israel and the State of Israel's democratically elected institutions."

The OU also reiterated its support for stem cell research In a release, it said it passed a resolution stating "its support, consistent with Orthodox rabbinic teaching, for the continuation of and public funding for cutting-edge biotechnology research, including embryonic stem cell research."

Riverdale Shul in danger of closing

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Last Chanukah, the Riverdale Shul threw a big party with plenty of latkes, jelly doughnuts, pizza and beer for the 50 people who attended. There was even a live band.

But this week, the small East End congregation has little to celebrate, because the shul is on the verge of closing its doors.

"It's going to be a sad Chanukah. This is the first time that there's no celebration," said Steve Jackson, the shul's president, gabbai, fundraiser and cook.

The shul, which is Orthodox in its practices, is out of money and needs a major cash infusion to survive, Jackson explained.

To that end, the congregation will be holding an emergency community meeting at 7 p.m. on Dec. 21 at the shul, located at 179a Danforth Ave.

Jackson said he's been raising money for the shul since its co-founder, documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici moved away from the area three years ago. "Simcha was a great resource, both spiritually and financially.

"Raising money the first year after he left was easy," Jackson said. "I was able to bring in $40,000. The next year was a real struggle. I was writing letters and knocking on doors… There are limited funds for the downtown Orthodox base.

"We need about $28,000 to cover our basic expenses."

He praised Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers for his long-time assistance. "Saul is our biggest supporter. He is the Cohen Gadol of the Danforth. There would be no shul without him."

Jackson estimated that about 120 people attend High Holy Day services and are affiliated with the shul, which mainly attracts Jews living east of Jarvis Street in places such as Cabbagetown, the Beaches and Leaside.

He said a core group of 20 to 25 people attend Shabbat services regularly and participate in programs. Up to a year ago, the shul held a different program six days a week. The offerings included ethics, Hebrew lessons for adults, and weekly classes on the parshah and Halachah with Rabbi Avraham Kubayov.

This year should have been a time of celebration. The shul is marking an important milestone – its 10th anniversary.

It made headlines in 1994, when Jacobovici moved services out of his living room to a public space – a local Greek restaurant – for the High Holy Days.

Jacobovici, the driving force behind the congregation at the time, was eventually able to raise enough funds to rent space for the shul at its present location above a storefront on the Danforth.

Jacobovici, who now lives in Thornhill, told The CJN that he's saddened by news of a possible closure.

"The shul has been instrumental in creating a Jewish presence in the East End. Out of the shul, another shul grew," he said, referring to the Danforth Jewish Circle, a large liberal congregation.

"Many people have found their way back to their Jewish roots through this little synagogue. It's small, warm and inviting, and because it's not intimidating, it has been a perfect vehicle for reaching the unaffiliated.

"If it closes down, the Jewish community will be losing a very effective tool for reaching those Jews who are not reachable in any other way."

He also noted that the synagogue is relatively inexpensive to run because it's volunteer-based.

Jacobovici said he still feels a close personal connection to the shul. "For me and my family, the shul has been a very important part of our life. Its formal name is Beit Yosef and is named after my late father. There will be great poignancy for us if the shul ceases to exist."

Avraham Jay Glasser, one of the synagogue's founding members, expressed optimism about its future. He said the shul has grown and changed since the days when he was davening in Jacobovici's living room.

"We're in a period of transition. We are reorganizing to move forward at a time of economic crisis. We're turning to the greater community for support."

He stressed that the shul is the only place that offers a modern Orthodox service in Toronto's east end.

A Chanukah Reminder
Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

Three musical cultures

From the editor's desk

Music runs deeply in our tradition. From the spontaneous, cathartic singing after the miraculous parting of the Red Sea to the harp and lyre improvisations of King David and the carefully orchestrated accompaniments of the Levi'im (the Levites) during the Temple Service, singing has been as true and legitimate a religion expression as prayer.

During this Chanukah festival season, when readers might be more inclined to set aside some quiet time to listen to new music, I call attention to three recently released CDs of Jewish music.

They are vastly different. Each is a choral manifestation of a different time, place and culture. But each, too, is a representation of a distinctly Jewish experience of the soul's trans-generational reaching toward God.

Hodu is a collection of Jewish rhythms from Baghad to India. There are 12 holiday and Shabbat songs in this satisfying anthology. Most of us will be familiar with their titles, but most of us will not be familiar with their uniquely eastern stylings. As the liner notes indicate, the very name of the CD is a wonderful "double entendre for its music." For in Hebrew, Hodu means "praise God" and is also the name for the country India.

The CD primarily features the sweet voice of Rahel Musleah. Musleah, a seventh-generation member of a Calcutta family with roots in Baghdad, is a noted writer in the United States and chronicler of Sephardi customs and folkways. She is also, very obviously, a singer of great charm and nuance.

In most instances, Musleah sings solo, even a cappella; in others she is in duet with Alan Iny and with the accompaniment of an eastern-sounding violin, kanoun, oud and percussion. The Pesach medley replicates the seder itself and features an entire family of voices. An infectious energy and joy infuse all the songs. They are an evocation of a place far away but, happily, within our reach.

To obtain information about the CD's availability, visit www.rahel sjewishindia.com

When the Rabbi Danced is a compilation of 25 songs from the now-vanished culture of the eastern European shtetl. Indeed the subtitle on the CD cover describes the music as songs of Jewish life from the shtetl to the resistance.

The singers are Counterpoint, a Montreal-based group of 11 vocalists directed by Robert De Cormier. Six musicians provide the accompaniment on the recording and the result is a powerful, stimulating rendering of the songs that not only symbolize, but tragically, also memorialize the Ashkenazi Jewish society that the Nazis destroyed.

The Counterpoint voices are a felicitous blending of the full range of the male and female voice. They are an easy, entertaining treat to listen to.

De Cormier's interpretations of the songs are respectful of the times and the traditions whence they derive. He plainly understands the way of life, the travails, the tears and the hopes to which the songs bear witness and of which they are now a form of historical/cultural record.

The choir ably brings out the socio-cultural essences of the various songs. They adapt their full, robust sound to the "meaning" of the music. They do not attempt to adapt the essence of the music to satisfy their collective sound.

Their achievement is all the more noteworthy because Yiddish is not likely the first or even the second language for any of the singers. Yet they impart in their songs a poignant deference to the language that travels to the heart of the listener.

The CD is available through Albany Records.

Salmi di Davide (The Psalms of David) is music from an entirely different time and space. This release by ATMA Classique captures the music written by Benedetto Marcello in the Jewish quarter of 17th-century Venice.

Marcello was a musical innovator and pioneer. He wrote the music for the psalms in his native Italian, and not in the compulsory Latin. Moreover, he added traditional Hebrew intonations, which he had learned from his regular contact with Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews. His music is delicate, calming and pastoral.

When sung by Rinat Shaham, however, Marcello's musical musings become veritably ethereal. Her mezzo-soprano voice is angelic, a line of pure musical light.

Jay Bernfeld's Paris-based viola da gamba ensemble Fuoco e Cenere (Fire and Ash) provides the musical accompaniment of Salmi di Davide. The combined result is a cultural and musical authenticity, a lovely though somewhat melancholy entry into the long-past, dynamic, walled world of the Jews of Venice some four centuries ago.

In listening to these diverse musical collections, the experience is twofold: enjoying, but also learning of places and times that were once our own. — MBD

Iraqi Canadian launches anti-terrorism petition

By BRIAN HENRY
Special to The CJN

An Arab Canadian has helped launch a petition calling on the United Nations to prosecute Muslim clerics who incite terrorism through fatwas.

Jawad Hashim of Vancouver, formerly Iraq's minister of planning, together with Lafif Lakhdar, a Tunisian intellectual, and Dr. Shakir al-Nabulsi, a Jordanian writer, posted the petition on the liberal Muslim website Middle East Transparent and are calling on fellow Muslims to sign it.

Titled "Letter from liberal Arabs and Muslims," the petition's language is blunt. It refers to "fatwas issued by some psychotic… dogmatic Muslims encouraging the commission of terrorist acts in the name of and under the banner of Islam."

As examples, the petition lists a fatwa approving Al Qaeda's Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, a fatwa permitting the killing of Muslim intellectuals as apostates, a fatwa approving the killing of Jews while still in the womb and a fatwa approving the killing of any Israeli citizen.

"By these fatwas," the petition argues, "terrorists have died, or will die, fully convinced that they will immediately enter Paradise."

Here in Canada, when University of Waterloo professor Mohamed Elmasry justified terrorism against Israelis on the Michael Coren Show recently, he echoed the fatwa approving the killing of any Israeli citizen.

"There are no civilians in Israel," wrote Muslim intellectual Rashid al-Ghannoushi in his fatwa authorizing terrorism. "The population – males, females and children – are army reserve soldiers."

"[The] total population of Israel is part of the army," said Elmasry, and therefore, from age 18 on, any Israeli, male or female, is a legitimate target, "even if they have civilian clothes."

The originators of the petition are anxious to make it a strictly Muslim affair for now. "If we get support from non-Muslims," said Hashim, "they'll say we're lackeys of the U.S. – you know what these fanatics are like. I got an e-mail the other day calling us lackeys of the Masonic movement in the Middle East."

Pierre Akel, the publisher of Middle East Transparent, said the idea was to start with a Muslim petition, "and then go on to ask Jews and Christians to join for a new joint appeal."

To date, more than 4,000 Muslims have signed the petition. "Our target is to collect 10,000," said Hashim.

Former Iraqi minister has fought Holocaust denial in Arab world

A recent UN Security Council resolution has given him some encouragement.

"On Oct. 8 this year, the Security Council unanimously adopted Resolution 1566, which established a working group to find more effective procedures to bring terrorists – and their associates – to justice," Hashim said. "This is precisely what our letter proposes."

Websites around the world have reproduced the petition. It's also been published in many newspapers in Iraq and in one in Kuwait, although "no other newspaper in the Arab world published it," said Hashim.

In Canada, Hashim wrote to Prime Minister Paul Martin proposing that Canada host a gathering of Arab and Muslim intellectuals to promote the aims of the petition. He hasn't yet heard back from the prime minister and isn't hopeful.

However, Rahim Yaffer, a Conservative MP and a Muslim, is enthusiastic about the petition. "I think it's a very positive initiative," he said. "It should be encouraged. Many Muslims are very disturbed about how Islam is being used by a tiny minority as a tool for terrorism."

Yaffer said he'd prefer an initiative that's not just coming from Muslims, but from "all people to say, 'let's come together on this.'"

He said he would bring the petition up with Muslim and Arab leaders in Canada to see if there is interest in taking on this initiative and would present it to the Conservative caucus, as well. "I see some potential to bring attention to this initiative through bringing it up in the House [of Commons]," he added.

Yasmin Ratansi and Wajid Khan, the two other Muslim MPs, who are both Liberals, did not respond to requests for comment on the petition.

The petition was written by Lakhdar, a leading figure for modernization and secularization in the Arab world. Lakhdar had previously called for the outlawing of terrorist fatwas in a scathing article published in Al-Hayat, a London-based but Saudi-owned Arabic daily.

Lakhdar has also fought Holocaust denial in the Arab world, condemned the Palestinian embrace of terrorism and urged religious tolerance and emancipation for Arab women. Al-Hayat fired him.

Last year, he started Middle East Transparent with his friend Akel. "The idea," said Akel, "was to prove that Arab liberals can have an independent voice – i.e., independent from Saudi money and from any link to any Arab regime.

"I guess we have succeeded. We have 2,000 to 3,000 visitors per day. However, I have been personally financing the website for the last 11 months and might not be able to continue."

Fantino receives award from Beth Sholom

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Lauded as a great humanitarian and a genuine cop's cop, Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino garnered praise and admiration from a host of dignitaries who gathered recently to honour the chief for winning the Brotherhood of Beth Sholom Synagogue's Annual Award.

More than 400 people, including former prime minister John Turner, impresario David Mirvish, MP Belinda Stronach, Chief Justice of Ontario Roy McMurtry and Ontario Minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services Monte Kwinter, attended the 53rd annual award ceremony.

The award recognizes achievement in the field of humanitarian service and furthering the cause of brotherhood by being a friend and benefactor to all men, regardless of colour, race or creed.

"In today's world, the application of law and order is a very delicate procedure [requiring] protecting citizens… and yet ensuring human rights," Turner said.

Fantino was presented with the award by MP Belinda Stronach, a former winner who acknowledged the chief's "extraordinary achievements in humanitarian service."

The chief was noticeably moved when he accepted the award.

"It is indeed a humbling and very significant honour to stand here before you," he told attendees assembled at Beth Sholom. "I am most grateful."

Fantino has participated in humanitarian endeavours both on and off the job throughout his nearly four decades in law enforcement, including advocacy for race relations, programs for underprivileged children and promoting proactive policing of hate crimes.

For unequivocally denouncing a spate of anti-Semitic crimes that rocked Toronto in March of this year, Fantino was commended by numerous Jewish community leaders.

"These crimes brought us together in a unified voice to combat hate," Fantino said. "Only by teaching young people respect and tolerance can we shed preconceived biases and misconceptions."

Before being appointed chief of Toronto's police in 2000, Fantino was chief of police in both London, Ont., and York Region for most of the 1990s and spent 23 years in various roles with the Metropolitan Toronto Police Service.

Fantino is the past president of the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police and sits on the International Association of Chiefs of Police Board of Officers. In 2003, he was elected as vice-president at large of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, making him only the fourth Canadian to hold a position on the board.

Fantino has won numerous awards, including Commander of the Order of Merit to the Republic of Italy and the Queen's Golden Jubilee Medal. He is an inductee into the Ontario Special Olympics Hall of Fame.

Kwinter noted that last August, when the chief helped make an arrest at the Canadian National Exhibition on his way to another awards ceremony at a synagogue, he dutifully decided to direct traffic on a nearby street.

"Chief Fantino is always willing to listen to his officers and to the public," Kwinter said.

"He cares for his officers… and champions the rights of all citizens."

Journalist advises Israel to 'transfer' Palestinians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Joseph Farah would probably be the first to admit that his "road map to peace" in the Middle East leaves little room for mutual compromise and accommodation.

Farah – an Arab-American Christian of Syrian and Lebanese Catholic origin whose grandparents immigrated to the United States in the early 20th century – argues that Israel and the Palestinians cannot resolve their differences through political means.

In an interview, he said, "There won't be peace without a military solution. Israel will have to re-occupy the West Bank and the Gaza Strip."

Farah, who was here recently as the keynote speaker at a Canada Christian College conference on Arab persecution of Jews and Christians, added: "Violence will be required to bring peace. People don't want to hear that. It's not politically correct. But it's historically correct."

The 50-year-old founder, editor and chief executive officer of WorldNetDaily.com, a politically and socially conservative news site, advised Israel to annex the West Bank and Gaza and "transfer" its 3.5 million inhabitants to neighbouring Arab states.

"Population transfers are not pretty and not without problems," said Farah, an evangelical Christian who cites biblical passages in his writings to buttress his views.

Population transfers have taken place throughout history, said Farah, who has visited Israel 10 times since 1981. By way of example, he cited the case of the 100 million European refugees who were resettled after World War II.

"Judea and Samaria are traditionally Jewish. The Bible is the Jews' title deed to the Land of Israel. I don't understand why Israel would want to give up these areas. These are Jewish lands."

Farah, a journalist who hosts a nationally syndicated talk-radio show for Radio America, said, "Why should Jews accept the idea that they can't live in Judea and Samaria? That'll lead to the next Holocaust."

An ardent opponent of the now-defunct Oslo peace process and the current internationally sponsored "road map to peace," he denounced Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip. "It's a horrendous mistake. Gaza, an invasion route down through history, is strategically important for Israel's security."

But he expressed a measure of understanding for Sharon's motives. "Gaza is a cesspool, a hornet's nest."

The author of two best-selling books, See, I Told You So and Taking America Back, Farah openly admits that he subscribes to the evangelical view that Jews should convert to Christianity once Jesus appears as the messiah in the Second Coming.

"I want everyone, including Jews, to accept Christianity, though there's less urgency for Jews to do so because because we share the same values. We believe that all of Israel will be saved and will recognize that their Messiah is Jesus Christ. That's just God's plan."

Asked if Christianity is the most divine of religions, Farah replied, "That's true. That's how I would put it."

Farah, who described himself as "viscerally pro-Israel," said that he is popular in "more Orthodox and conservative quarters of Judaism" than in mainstream American Jewish circles.

He condemned the idea that the Palestinians are entitled to statehood.

"There's is no reason to create another terrorist state when the West is at war with terrorism. What need is there for one? I oppose it in theory and practice."

The Palestinian quest for statehood is linked to their Machiavellian plan to destroy Israel, said Farah, chiding U.S. President George W. Bush for supporting and promoting a two-state solution. "This has been a decision by elitists in the White House and the State Department."

The whole notion of Palestinian statehood is fraudulent and was invented in the 1960s by Yasser Arafat, the late president of the Palestinian Authority, Farah said.

Warming to the topic, Farah added that the Palestinian refugee problem is a purely Arab creation. "It was a relatively minor refugee crisis that could have been settled within a year.

"The Arabs – and I can say this as an Arab – are great storytellers, the Arabian Nights and all these things. They lie that the Jews threw the Arabs out of their homes. If you tell a big lie often enough, people will believe it."

Echoing a view held by the late Golda Meir, a former Israeli prime minister, Farah said the Palestinians do not even exist as a separate, identifiable group.

Very few of the Arab inhabitants in the West Bank and Gaza have deep indigenous roots, he noted. The Palestinians are really a multitude of Arabs from all corners of the Arab world.

"Arafat was an Egyptian," said Farah, who has called the Palestinian leader a "degenerate pervert," "a liar," and "pro-Nazi scum."

Farah, a contributor to the Jerusalem Post, asserted that a sovereign Palestinian state would be intrinsically racist.

"The Palestinian Authority has an official policy of no-Jews-allowed. That's why the [Jewish] settlers have to leave [the West Bank and Gaza]. We call this ethnic cleansing and racism elsewhere.

"Why doesn't the world understand that we're about to create a racist, anti-Semitic state. This is right out in the open, with the whole world watching."

Jews are not the only victims of Muslim Arab oppression in the Middle East. "Christian Arabs have fled for their lives," observed Farah, a resident of Virginia who was a newspaper editor before founding WorldNetDaily.com in 1997.

Too soon to see a change

What was truly a change last week in relation to Canada's voting behaviour on Israel-Palestinian resolutions at the United Nations was not the actual substantive record of the votes. Rather, it was the statement on Nov. 30 that preceded the votes by Canada's UN Ambassador Allan Rock.

Indeed, for the first time in the General Assembly, Canada voted against two resolutions that emanated, respectively, from the euphemistically named special committee to investigate Israeli practices and the committee on the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. On the other hand, again for the first time, Canada voted in support of a resolution on the risk of nuclear proliferation in the Middle East, which, typical of all the problematic Middle East resolutions in the General Assembly, singles out Israel as the rogue state among all the states in the Middle East. And in respect of a handful of other less inflammatory resolutions, Canada's votes remained as in years past.

What did significantly shift, however, was the Canadian UN ambassador's line of sight in the Mideast conflict. He painted an impression of the situation, also for the first time, without turning a blind eye to the dissembling, the distortions and the indiscretions of the Palestinian leadership.

"References to Israeli security needs," he said, "are often overlooked in the General Assembly. Repeatedly emphasizing Israel's responsibility under international law obscures equally important responsibilities of other parties to the conflict." In uncharacteristically frank language, Rock said the UN resolutions related to Israel and the Palestinians are "often divisive and lack balance." Rock urged the UN to desist from being the poisoned cauldron in which Israel – and Israel alone – is perennially cast. The time had come, Rock said, "to evaluate the efforts that all of us make at the United Nations to determine if they could be re-directed toward more constructive outcomes."

Even with the refreshingly honest words directed at his fellow UN representatives, however, Rock emphasized that Canadian Middle East policy had not changed. "The fundamental elements of my country's policy in the Middle East are unshakable."

Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew repeated the very same message in an op-ed piece in the National Post on the weekend when he articulated seven core tenets of Canada's Middle East policy, the first two of which were "support for Israel and its security, and support for Palestinian aspirations to statehood to be achieved through negotiation."

Thus, the true picture of Canada's UN Middle East voting record will not have been painted until the colours from the remaining dozen resolutions on the agenda are added. Only then will we be able to definitively say, as John Ibbitson in the Globe and Mail last weekend said, "Canada significantly shifted its Mideast policy." Until then, alas, it is too soon to see, let alone say, it has changed.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Well done, Israel!

The winners of the Wall Street Journal's 2004 Technology Innovation Awards competition have been announced. Innovators worldwide were considered.

The gold award went to Sun Microsystems Inc. of California for a wireless approach to chip design.

The silver award went to Given Imaging Ltd. of Yoqneam, Israel, for PillCam, a tiny camera that patients swallow so that doctors can see their digestive tracts.

The bronze award went to InSightec Image Guided Treatment Ltd. of Tirat Carmel, Israel, for ExAblate 2000, a non-surgical way to destroy tumours by focusing ultrasound waves on them.

This is a wonderful achievement for Israel. From a worldwide search, Israel took two of the top three places. We should celebrate this and bring it to the attention of the press worldwide.

Israel often receives undeserved bad press. Let us counter this with some positive images. Well done, Israel!

Objects to right-wing agenda

Jews who voted for President George W. Bush in the recent U.S. election are suffering from historical amnesia and are involved with some dangerous politics. How can Rabbi Abraham Cooper, a man whose job it is to preserve the memory of the Shoah, shrug off Jewish involvement with evangelical Christians, whose job it is to convert Jews? ("U.S. Jewish vote moving rightward, rabbi believes," CJN, Nov. 11.) These same evangelicals are often on the wrong side of human rights issues.

To me, the concept of right-wing Jews is anathema. Look carefully at the right-wing agenda and you will find many ideas that are contrary to all our notions of justice.

Arab societies hold people back

The assertion that the root cause of the Mideast problem is the mentality of the Arab political and social structure was right on (Editor's desk, Nov. 25). There are three wars going on – Israeli/Palestinian, Arab/Israeli and Muslim/Western.

But added to this, the biggest battles we have in life are with ourselves. It is the internal problems in the Arab world that are the biggest obstacles to Arabs coming into the 21st century and achieving peace.

But this issue has actually been with us in understanding biblical themes. I find it funny, because the revolution/evolution of the Jewish people coming out of Egypt was the rejection of the thinking of that society.

Even though ancient Egyptian civilization disappeared, the mentality did not. Arab societies are shame-based.

The message of what happened in coming out of Egypt is as follows: Human beings are meant to be free and if you are going to be free, the responsibility is not to abuse the power of your free will. We are to see the infinite potential of every other person, who is also created in the image of God, so do not do anything to other individuals that prevents them from exercising their own free will.

It seems to me that this idea really does not exist in the Arab/Muslim world. And until it does, things will not change.

ARCfest responds to accusations

On Nov. 18, The CJN featured an article titled "Anti-Israel school presentation under investigation." The presentation it referred to was part of ARCfest's (Art for Real Change: Toronto's Human Rights Arts Festival) educational outreach program, which presented a workshop on women's rights and equity issues at Earl Haig Secondary School.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Simon Rosenblum claimed that one of the poems presented was about the "evils of Israelis as a people." From this, he concluded that the ARCfest presentation was "inflammatory, one-sided and highly prejudicial."

These claims were never substantiated, as neither The CJN nor the CJC had read the poem before drawing their conclusions.

To clarify the matter, the presentation was a part of ARCfest – a first-year festival committed to championing social justice and human rights through the arts. The poem in question was written by a young artist and speaks of her personal experience as an activist, poet and Palestinian growing up in a war-torn region and her empathy for women in similar situations around the world.

It is extremely dangerous for a spokesperson for the Canadian Jewish Congress to allege that a presentation is "inflammatory," or that it depicts "the evils of Israelis as a people," when such claims are unfounded. Moreover, when these incidents do occur, they risk not to be taken seriously. Surely officials at Congress have learned to address such matters more appropriately.

We are further concerned with the manner in which The CJN headlined the story, tacitly accepting the accusations made by the CJC.

In our estimation, both the Canadian Jewish Congress and The CJN acted irresponsibly.

Hostility toward Israel by world bodies is out of whack

This is an excerpt from the keynote address by Rex Murphy, a news commentator with the The National on CBC Television, at the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy parliamentary dinner in Ottawa on Nov. 1.

By REX MURPHY

I want to begin at the one moment that officially began this millennium. The effective beginning of this century or of this millennium, certainly, on this side of the world, but I expect globally as well, were the undeniable horrors that occurred on Sept. 11, 2001.

There was something there that was of vast meaning even beyond the immediacies of tragedy, a bigger point that we here in Canada speak of only now.

Since about World War II, in contrast with almost any other places of the globe, we have had a sequence of more or less untrammelled prosperity.

We've had differences and quarrels and certain high flash points, but we've had no real taste of the anger, pain, rage and want that is so descriptive of the majority of lives almost everywhere else.

And for 60 years or so, the progress of this country, under the institutions that it knows – Parliament, universities, schools and the legacies of history – have built up certain habits and tolerances, a predilection that has become part of the Canadian temperament for the middle course of civic harmony…

When 9/11 did occur, people who gave it some reasonable amount of thought recognized that the long period of tranquillity, which is so much a part of our peace and our temper, was the exception… To have had such a period uninterrupted by the great upheavals and havocs of the world was the great exception.

The principal virtue of this country is its civic temperament… There is a sense of grounded harmony [here] and there's some sense of outrage too, if people walk beyond that.

The first virtue of any state is the safety of its citizens. That is a truism as old as the Romans who wrote it. But the safety of citizens can be most profoundly attended by placing value on civility, habits of tolerance and respect.

We can provide an index of how much we value what is normal and civilized when we witness any outrages against the great codes of our civic understanding, when the ethos of civility is being shredded by the malice of those who would forward a grievance with disrespect for those foundational codes.

We will show how much we value those codes of civility by reserving our deepest opprobrium and anger for those who, with the arrogance that only belongs to the true believer, wish to take the short cuts of hate and violence and who would devalue the currency of social and political exchange that belongs to all of us.

[Sept.] 9/11 is the most catechistic example of an arrogance that is almost supernal.

If there is a cause, and I stress, if there is a cause that Osama Bin Laden wishes to adjust, under what understanding and under what code does he arrogate to his individual self [the right] to execute a plan of such fiendishness? Is it because, in the fullness of his ambition and ego, the dismissal of the lives of others by violence, murder and death is okay?

The most remarkable thing that spins out of 9/11… was the secondary response to it.

We now know for sure who planned it and who did it. We do not know, however, the murkiness of that mind and the particular hidden reasons he may have had. But we know, more or less, that it was an act of violence and hatred to break all the normal civilizational codes that come into play when there is political or social disagreement.

But the secondary response was the attempt, even within hours – you all remember this because it was staggering – from the great papers all over the world, in Britain and in some of our own, to displace the immediate responsibility [for 9/11] and to find contextual understanding for the deed and somehow make others complicit in an act of demonic violence.

There was one classic example of this. The poet laureate of New Jersey, Amiri Baraka, wrote what he was pleased to call a poem, some of whose lines raised this question: who told the 4,000 Jews who worked in the twin towers to stay home that day?

> 'We make vivid the distinction between disagreements and violence...'

The other distressing thing about 9/11, as the days pass from the event itself, was the attempt to make it seem as if perhaps the conflict in the Middle East is somehow or other the engine for it, the most devastating, callous and wanton act that this side of the world has ever seen.

The readiness with which circumstances of tension and peril are coated over, or at least associated with agency that comes out of the struggle in the Middle East, associated with the Jews, or finding secondary or tertiary reasons that link events that have, by any plain understanding, a full account of themselves as themselves – that's a strain in this current world I find very difficult.

We have heard it said, for example, that Bin Laden was the creation of the United States. I've never understood that either. I would have thought that more or less, like the rest of us, he was first the creation of his parents, his circumstances, his culture, his country and a whole grand blend of idiosyncrasy and temperament that makes up an individual sensibility. Bin Laden is Bin Laden's creation.

Rex Murphy

But there are even more amazing contortions, worse than the proto-verse of New Jersey's poet laureate, and these are the ones which touch on Israel, and in a more blatant form, the Jews.

This is the more insidious and vicious idea that American policy, since 9/11 and especially in its war in Iraq, is nothing but an extension of Israel's interest: Bush as a puppet of the Israelis; Bush, the prisoner of the neocon cabal.

This is all code for a really old story that every person in this room knows better than I. What I see here is the calculated opportunism of taking a monstrous and defining event and bending it to serve preordained attitudes and conclusions…

In other words, it is the strain of pseudo-thought, all too comfortably coincident with the most malicious and perdurable prejudice with which the western world has had tragic acquaintance: anti-Semitism…

It is astonishing that 65 or 70 years after the inferno of the Holocaust, the greatest moral injury in a single event that the world has ever seen or perpetrated… that [there could be] even intimations of hostility towards Jews again…

In a sense, I know, but not to the degree that most of the people here know, something of the horrors in Israel, the fact that on a daily basis, hourly basis, they are challenged to hold onto the civic virtues, in a crucible that is so much deeper and hotter than the crucible we, in this country, face. But the fact that the cardinal virtues are still being asserted, that prejudice is still being rooted out, that the goals, the ideals of democracy – respect, the participation of all citizens, the glorification of life itself – remain central, is a beacon in and of itself…

There is something crazy about in the world. Jews and Israel are always going to be at the centre of it but the degree to which, in the present defused anxiety, Israel or the conflict in the Middle East becomes some sort of central explanation, is appalling. The degree, the intensity, and the frequency of opprobrium directed by world bodies at Israel, is vastly out of proportion to the specifics or particulars of the case and is totally out of whack with the proportion and attention to other areas…

When all the planes were called down [on 9/11]… about 27 of them landed in Gander. [The passengers] got on little school buses in Gander, which is a metropolis of at least 5,000, and then they hived out to Gambo, which is a suburban sprawl of at least 800…

A town like Gambo or the 150 others that we have down there in Newfoundland is subject to storm and blast and tragedy. If a man goes overboard, 18 other families will quietly, with great tact, make sure that the widow is taken care of. Things are left very quietly at night; people look after you.

It's a habit built of necessity. It's a habit that works, that the people there say we are interconnected… This readiness to respond with a full heart… was so natural. That's the glory of it.

But [that readiness] was built with the habits of generations. It's not an accident. Need imposed it first, then the people there saw the benefits of it, how communities bond. They saw how the exercise of this thing is a joy in itself…

Their help [to the stranded passengers] was so full and so rich and so gorgeous that even in the midst of this great tragic moment, people were overwhelmed…

The main point of that story is that the hospitality was a reflex of centuries…

If there is anything that we value [about our country], it is these codes of understanding and tolerance, that our disagreements have a certain point that we reach and it doesn't go beyond that. And we make vivid the distinction between disagreements and violence…

What we have in our country… is tolerance; we have central understanding, we have respect; we try to keep things moderate; we value the substance and spirit of life. In this kind of civic arrangement, all of us have the chance for full potential and equal freedoms…

The nature of Canada is the idea at the centre and that idea is its own civic understanding: the codes of tolerance, understanding and welcome. In this country, there is a welcome for any group that speaks against those that would violate those fundamental codes. And there is a spirit that would favour those who reject violence and hate as the short-cut instruments for some particular and crazy dream…

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Apartheid, in its literal translation from Afrikaans, means separateness, and as applied within the unique context of 20th century South Africa, it embraced racial segregation as the cornerstone of government policy and practice. From cradle to grave, skin colour was the sole determinant of where you lived and worked, what job options you had, where you went to school, how you travelled, and which health care and sports facilities were available to you. A comprehensive and rigorously enforced set of laws and prohibitions ensured that transgressors would be severely dealt with. And they were.

With the transition to majority rule under Nelson Mandela in 1994, the infrastructure of the apartheid state was dismantled and its long-hated ideology of systematized racism was dispatched to the dustbin of history. But while apartheid no longer has legal tenure in South Africa, accusations that it has found new application in Israel's dealings with the Palestinians have become increasingly prevalent. Thus, we all too frequently see Israel's law of return portrayed as just another instrument of a "racist apartheid state," while the emerging seam zone is ominously referred to as "the apartheid wall." The word "bantustans" – connoting tribal homelands for black South Africans in the apartheid model – is often used by Israel's detractors to describe any emerging Palestinian state that doesn't include all of the Jewish one.

Such comparisons are fallacious. They are also calculated and malicious. Writing in the Guardian (Nov. 14), Benjamin Pogrund, one of South Africa's most distinguished journalists and currently director of Yakar's Center for Social Concern in Jerusalem, astutely notes that "anyone who says that Israel is apartheid does not appreciate what apartheid was." He attributes "clear purpose" to those who are striving "to make the apartheid stigma stick." That objective, he believes is "to have Israel viewed as, and declared, illegitimate – and to ensure that Israelis are made unwelcome abroad and that it becomes politically correct to boycott Israeli products and to discourage investment in the country."

Such punitive treatment, incidentally, is precisely what was imposed on South Africans during the apartheid era, so the trends in this propagandist charade are not that difficult to interpret.

In a world where Israel-bashing needs no calling card, the apartheid slur adds yet another weapon to an already replete stockpile. By overplaying the apartheid card at the UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban in 2001, the anti-Israel lobby may have lost some momentum in its nefarious crusade. More recently, however, the security fence has provided that same lobby with a renewed opportunity to invoke its vile apartheid constructs as a basis for attacking Israel and Israeli interests. Promptly debunking the myths and misconceptions of these inherently false analogies, therefore, becomes that much more important.

The dilemma of the security barrier

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

More often than not here in Israel, we are limited to only bad options when addressing our more acute security concerns. These consist, for the most part, of stopgap measures aimed at alleviating an immediate pressure. In our shark-infested waters, permanent remedies are generally beyond reach, and one soon becomes resigned to making the most of the brief calms between existential crises.

I view the new security barrier in this light – as a short-term measure. For, highly effective as it is in reducing suicide terror, there is reason to believe that over time, it will create even greater problems than it solves.

With the perfect vision of hindsight, we can now better appreciate that the widespread euphoria that followed the Six Day War of 1967 was somewhat misplaced and short-sighted. The return of the Jewish people as a sovereign power to its historical and religious heartland after nearly 2,000 years was an epic event. But in the enthusiasm of the moment, we failed to accurately assess some of the more negative implications of this historic development.

Take the case of Jerusalem at the time. A number of legislative initiatives quickly provided a legal basis for the annexation of what had formerly been the Jordanian part of the divided city, as well as for the inclusion in the newly united capital of additional tracts of captured land. Security advantages aside, the hope was that in the years to come, the greatly expanded municipal area would accommodate major urban development and a correspondingly large-scale increase in the Jewish population.

But there was a catch – for annexation and enlargement meant the inclusion in municipal Jerusalem of the Arabs (Palestinians) residing in the newly appended territory. In 1967, these Palestinian Jerusalemites accounted for 25 per cent of the city's population. Today, however, they account for a whopping 33 per cent of it. Simply put, natural growth of the resident non-Israeli Palestinian minority has far outstripped our efforts to shift the demographic balance further in favour of the Israeli Jewish majority.

It is against this factual backdrop that we must view the issue of the security barrier. No one would argue that the newly established system, if it is to provide maximum protection from Palestinian terror, must strive towards maximum separation between the two peoples. But a second imperative is to send a clear signal to those Palestinians who would seek to kill us that their violence will not be rewarded with political gains on the ground. This is what seems to be driving the thinking and implementation of the defence system, even when that necessity undermines, to some extent, the main purpose of the barrier.

For the most part, the fence-cum-wall hugs the municipal boundary as it was redrawn in 1967. In other words, the generous offers of prime minister Ehud Barak at Camp David in 2000, providing for the transfer of significant areas of Jerusalem to the sovereign control of the Palestinian Authority in return for peace, find little or no expression in its present route. It leaves almost all of Jerusalem on our side of the fence, almost none on theirs. There is a clear message here that Palestinian violence has not paid off.

Unfortunately, the confinement of the already huge local Palestinian population of Jerusalem to the "Israeli" side of the barrier along with us, cut off from their cultural and national hinterland beyond, might well be a prescription for disaster. Should this allegedly "temporary" security measure solidify, in the context of a protracted political stalemate, into a de facto border of sorts, then at least some of these "internal" Palestinians could be expected to seek an outlet for their pent-up frustrations and rage in hostile actions against us. That will be a relatively easy matter when more than 200,000 of them live but a short, unimpeded hop away from downtown Jewish Jerusalem.

And as though that, in itself, was not adequate cause for genuine concern, we simply cannot afford to ignore population trends either. If past trends are any indication of future ones, then we might just awaken one morning to the reality that we Jews are perilously close to becoming a minority in what was supposed to be the eternal, undivided capital of the Jewish people and state.

Human rights groups are working against peace

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

It is too early to know where Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's departure will lead, but for the first time in many years, there is some reason for optimism. Many obstacles must be overcome, but Arafat's successors have a chance to move away from "armed struggle," incitement, and efforts to erase Israel from the map. To foster this process, they must first end Palestinian chaos and use massive aid for economic development instead of channelling funds to private accounts and illegal arms.

But even with the best of intentions, it will take a much wider effort to reverse generations of hatred and terrorism. The culture of compromise must be anchored in broad public support.

Third parties can play a role in this immense task – particularly the non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that are active in human rights and humanitarian issues.

But these groups have an abysmal track record. With their multi-million-dollar budgets, global superpowers such as Human Rights Watch (HRW), Amnesty International, Christian Aid, Oxfam and dozens of smaller allied groups have contributed to the hatred, rather than supporting peace. Their activities amplify the rhetoric that labels Israel as an "apartheid regime" and Jews as "imperialists" and "colonialists," while whitewashing terror and condemning Israeli defensive actions.

In contrast to their PR images as peacemakers, the one-sided approach of the NGOs boosts radical Palestinians voices. HRW and Amnesty use terms such as "war crimes" to condemn Israeli defensive actions while closing their eyes to terror. And by ignoring Palestinian corruption, these groups have helped to keep the PA elite in power.

Similarly, NGOs based in Canada, and financed in part by the Canadian government, contribute to the demonization process. For example, KAIROS, which calls itself "a coalition of churches… devoted to justice," is funded by the Canadian International Development Agency and member churches. As documented by www.ngo-monitor.org, KAIROS is also active in selling Palestinian distortions of history (while claiming that "Israeli occupation is the root cause of the violence"), as well as denouncing Israeli "war crimes" and exploiting the vocabulary of human rights. Similarly, the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC), "Rights & Democracy," and Montreal-based Alternatives use government humanitarian funds to wage political war against Israel.

Thus, rather than fostering support for fundamental reform, these human rights and aid groups help to legitimize the culture of hatred and ideology of murder. The NGO community has lost direction, destroying the human rights norms that it claims to support.

This was highlighted in September 2001 at the UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, where HRW and Amnesty joined hundreds of NGOs to promote the equating of Zionism with racism. This process continued with the orchestrated condemnation of Israel's separation barrier as an "apartheid wall," while referring to anti-terror actions in Jenin and elsewhere as "war crimes."

The political obsession with Israel has also led to the neglect of mass killings in areas such as Central Africa or Sudan, where there is less media coverage and political mileage. After years of relative silence, HRW only put Sudan on the top of its agenda after media and U.S. government reports of mass brutality.

Despite these failures, a "halo effect" protects the NGOs from the accountability they demand from others. Kenneth Roth, who has headed New York-based HRW for decades, recently used part of his $22-million (US) war chest to hold a press conference at Jerusalem's American Colony Hotel (the main Palestinian public relations hub). He was publicizing a 135-page report condemning Israeli military actions in Gaza. Few noticed that the claims were based on unverified evidence from Palestinian "eyewitnesses."

A few days later, London-based Christian Aid denounced Israel's "land grab policy" and unveiled its Christmas campaign about Palestinian suffering that features posters of a "child from Bethlehem" – a thinly disguised anti-Semitic image. In this biased environment, pretensions that human rights and humanitarian groups promote peace have no credibility.

As a result, the NGO community is, tragically, in no position to help end the violence and promote understanding. Before they can preach to others, they will have to drop their ideological agendas and demonstrate a credible commitment to the universal human rights values that they claim to advance.

The Kirshner File

South African Jews and apartheid

Apartheid, the system of legalized racial discrimination that coloured South Africa's political complexion for almost 40 years, generally stirred deep ambivalence among Jewish South Africans.

On the one hand, they were uncomfortable with the ethos of white supremacy, which rigorously regulated relations between whites and non-whites. Having suffered from persistent persecution down through the ages, Jews could only recoil at the thought of what the South African government euphemistically described as "separate development." (I well remember a trip to South Africa 20 years ago, when I was shocked and appalled to see a blatantly discriminatory sign barring blacks, coloureds and Asians from a public beach in Durban).

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On the other hand, Jews clearly benefited from the privileges conferred on whites by apartheid and were not eager to undermine their status by actively opposing this profoundly unjust system. Yet, a disproportionate number of Jews, all on the left, did take a principled stand against apartheid.These cross-currents are at the centre of Gideon Shimoni's immensely interesting and nuanced book on the subject, Community and Conscience: The Jews in Apartheid South Africa (University Press of New England).

Shimoni, director of the Hebrew University's Institute of Contemporary Jewry, confines his study to the period from 1948 to 1994. The Afrikaner-based National party institutionalized the long-accepted British colonial practice of apartheid when it came to power in 1948. But white minority rule ended in 1994 when South Africa held its free election, in which non-whites were given the franchise and Nelson Mandela emerged as its first black president.

As Shimoni observes, Jews were less than thrilled by the National party's victory in 1948. He writes that "a cold shiver of shock and anxiety ran through the Jewish community." Jews were wary of the National party because certain National politicians and publications had been hostile to Jews and Jewish interests. These white hot memories had yet to cool when Daniel Malan assumed the presidency in 1948.

In a bid to defuse the suspicions of Jews, Malan received a delegation from the Jewish Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization of South African Jewry, and assured them he looked forward to the day when "the so-called Jewish question will disappear altogether from the life of this country and its politics."

Malan took another conciliatory step in 1953 by visiting Israel, the world's first head of state to do so, albeit in a supposedly private capacity. This was an important gesture, since Zionism was, and still is, an integral component of Jewish identity in South Africa.

Malan's policy was maintained by his successors, J.G. Strijdom, H.F. Verwoerd and B.J. Vorster. Still, the vast majority of Jews never really warmed to the National party and its guiding credo, apartheid.

Mainly of Lithuanian origin, South African Jews were more liberal and less intolerant of non-whites than other Caucasians. In general, they gravitated toward the centrist United party rather than the Progressive party, headed by Helen Suzman, a fierce critic of apartheid who called for the repeal of two of its pillars, the Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act and the Immorality Act.

Scarcely any Jews voted for, or acquired membership in, the National party, which seemed beyond the pale. When a journalist associated with the Zionist Record, Henry Katzew, implicitly supported apartheid, there was an uproar.

During the late 1970s, the pattern changed as an increasing proportion of Jews began casting their ballots for the National party. In 1987, in the twilight of apartheid, Sam Bloomberg became the first Jew ever to be seated in parliament as one of its duly elected representatives.

Despite its misgivings about apartheid, South Africa's Jewish leadership tended to be conservative and did not rock the boat. Adhering to a policy of scrupulous non-involvement in politics, the Jewish Board of Deputies opted for neutrality. At one of its biennial congresses, a resolution was passed affirming the notion that "Jews participate in South African public life as citizens… and have no collective attitude to the political issues which citizens are called upon to decide… Jews share with their fellow citizens of other faiths and origins a common interest in and responsibility for our country's affairs and participate in them according to their individual convictions."

South Africa's rabbis, particularly those from the Orthodox and Conservative streams, rarely crossed swords with the prevailing order. But Moses Cyrus Weiler, a leading rabbi in Reform Judaism, was a signatory to a protest by civic and clerical leaders against segregation at universities, and criticized the forced removal of non-whites from designated areas and townships in Johannesburg, the commercial capital of South Africa.

Even so, Rabbi Weiler was mindful of his responsibility to the collective safety of the Jewish community. As he gingerly put it, "my attitude to the non-European section of South Africa's population is not political… I do not engage in political activities, but participate… in work for the welfare of non-Europeans. Furthermore, I do so… as a rabbi, motivated by the tenets of prophetic Judaism."

When, as once happened, a rabbi expressed unequivocal opposition to apartheid, the response of the Jewish leadership was unsparing. After Andre Ungar, a Hungarian rabbi, immigrated to South Africa in 1955 to take up a position in a Reform shul in Port Elizabeth, he attacked apartheid both from the pulpit and on public platforms. In 1956, the government withdrew his residency permit and ordered him to leave, and the Jewish Board of Deputies issued a statement that said he had spoken "neither for his own congregation nor for South African Jewry as a whole."

Craven though this tongue-lashing might have been, it did not obviously reflect the views of Jews who opposed apartheid unreservedly. Out of all proportion to their numbers, Jews held key positions in the African National Congress, which spearheaded the struggle against apartheid.

Joe Slovo, a lawyer, was variously chief of staff of the ANC's military arm, Umkhonto we Sizwe, and the first white on its national executive. Slovo's wife, Ruth First, a journalist assassinated by South Africa's security services, was research director of the Center for African Research.

Fully half the whites in the epic 1956 Treason Trial were Jewish, while the chief defence counsel, Israel Maisels, was a member of the Jewish Board of Deputies and the Zionist Federation. Similarly, one of the accused in the celebrated 1963-64 Rivonia Trial was a Jew, though the public prosecutor in that case, Percy Yutar, an observant Jew, was the deputy attorney general of Transvaal province.

Throughout the 1950s, South Africa had cordial ties with Israel. But in 1961, a tense period set in when Israel, then in the process of establishing a web of relationships with black African countries, voted for United Nations resolutions censuring South Africa. By way of reaction, South Africa temporarily suspended charitable fund transfers to Israel.

Israel offended South Africa again in 1971 by making a small contribution to the UN's African Liberation Committee. The South African media attacked the move as a direct gesture of identification with terrorist attacks on South Africa, while the Jewish Board of Deputies and the Zionist Federation issued a joint statement condemning "support for terrorism."

The 1973 Yom Kippur War ushered in a new chapter in Israel's bilateral relations with South Africa. In the aftermath of the war, black African states, succumbing to Arab pressure, severed diplomatic links with Israel. In response, Israel forged closer relations with South Africa, as Shimoni documents at length. But in the late 1980s, a fresh crisis roiled Israel's relationship with South Africa yet again.

The issue of emigration plays no small role in Shimoni's narrative. As political unrest gripped South Africa after the 1960s, more and more Jews left the country. From 1970 to 1979, 21,000 of them emigrated, bound primarily for Israel, United States, Canada, Britain and Australia. Emigration continued apace in the 1980s and 1990s, sapping the vitality of the Jewish community, which is still the biggest on the African continent. At last count, South Africa was home to some 80,000 Jews.

The post-apartheid era has not been an easy one. "Our future rests on a knife edge balanced precariously between hope for a peaceful democratic non-racial future and the equal possibility of sliding into the abyss of civil war," declared Harold Rudolph, the former Jewish mayor of Johannesburg, in an apt summation of the current situation.

However, Mandela's positive attitude toward Jews, plus South Africa's stable transition toward multiracial democracy, appears to have lifted some of the gloom.

Reisman, Cassaday receive CCCJ awards

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Heather Reisman called for Canadians to be both tolerant and vigilant as she accepted the Canada Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ) Human Relations Award during a recent dinner and ceremony celebrating the council's 57th year.

"We must actively engage [our communities]," she said. "Exercise our idealism, but be vigilant… So that [Canada] can continue to shine brightly in a sometimes dark world."

Reisman, founder and CEO of Indigo Books and Music, was awarded for her contribution to a variety of initiatives that span social, religious, racial and ethnic communities. She is also an officer of Mount Sinai Hospital, as well as a board member and adviser to many organizations, including Holy Blossom Temple and World Literacy of Canada.

"She is everything a person would want to be when they grow up," said Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Silberman Abella, who presented Reisman with the award. "She's certainly what I want to be."

Reisman was a co-recipient of the award with John Cassaday, president and CEO of Corus Entertainment. Cassaday has long been active in the non-profit sector, including chairing the St. Michael's Hospital board and Toronto's United Way campaign. In 1995, Cassaday led the campaign to raise over $52 million.

"I want to share my belief," he said, "that we as individuals can make a difference in the communities we live in, if we make it a priority."

The CCCJ was founded in 1947 to combat racism and anti-Semitism in Canada. Today, the organization provides programs to increase understanding and acceptance among people of different religious, social and ethnic backgrounds. In the past year, more than 10,000 high school students have participated in programs offered by the CCCJ.

In conjunction with the awards dinner, 150 students from 19 Ontario high schools met during the day for the third annual Young Leaders' Forum. The forum focused on building leadership skills and awareness of social justice matters. The students talked about how communities can increase understanding and acceptance, as well as intolerance in a democratic society.

"The Sept. 11 tragedy showed us that deep-seated prejudices have not faded and that suspicion and hatred can quickly be ignited," said Carla Wittes, CCCJ program co-ordinator. "The Young Leaders' Forum provides an opportunity for young people to show us the way to resolving conflict and building a more peaceful community and country."

The forum, which is sponsored by the Law Foundation of Ontario, plans to expand its program in 2005 to reach out to teachers and students from the wider southern Ontario region.

Professor Irving Abella, who co-chaired the awards dinner and is a governor of the CCCJ, described Canada, in 1947, as "barely recognizable… a xenophobic society permeated by a smothering layer of racism and anti-Semitism."

Today, he said, the CCCJ works with many communities, including Hindu, Muslim and Sikh to combat prejudice and hate.

Riverdale Shul does outreach to assist homeless Jews

For Jackson, a long-time Riverdale resident who became observant eight years ago, the shul has made it possible for him to daven in his own community with others on Shabbat.

Jackson said the shul also does outreach to homeless Jews. "I've dealt with several. I've fed them. I still do. They've slept in the shul. You can't leave people out in the cold. When homeless Jewish people are in the area and they see the sign, they ask for help. We help them."

Like Jacobovici, Jackson stressed the drawing power of the shul's inclusiveness. "We appeal to the dispossessed Jews who might feel intimidated by a more formal structure and who are more comfortable with traditional Orthodox practices than the more liberal forms of Judaism.

"Everyone is welcome. We make no demands for money or membership. That's what it took to attract people in this area. It's not Bathurst and Lawrence.

"To open an Orthodox shul on the Danforth, the rules had to be different and the comfort level of the worshippers has been very important."

Anti-occupation Jews not self-hating: academic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a plea for tolerance, a Canadian academic has urged the organized Jewish community to respect the views of Jews opposed to Israel's occupation of the territories.

Sheryl Nestel, a sociologist who lived in Israel for 15 years and now teaches at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, told a forum at the Winchevsky Centre recently that dissent is deeply rooted in Jewish tradition and that diversity is the essence of democracy.

"People have to recognize that Jews have diverse opinions," said Nestel. "We can't have a Jewish community with one monolithic line on Israel. Not all Jews in Canada agree with Israel's line on the Palestinians."

Nestel, a peace activist who has worked for a two-state solution since the late 1960s, said that Jewish dissenters are not self-hating Jews, and should not be treated like traitors or compared to wartime Judenrat officials.

She declared that they care about Israel, are committed to Jewish life and are inspired by Jewish values and ethics.

"Talmudic tradition encourages disputatiousness, yet Jewish dissenters are censured by the Jewish community, and this makes Jewish life quite sterile."

Attempts to silence dissent do not bode well for the vitality of the community, she added.

As an example, she claimed that the downtown Jewish Community Centre permitted an anti-occupation group to use its premises on condition that its meeting was not advertised.

Nestel presented the findings of a survey on Jewish dissenters she and a colleague, Emma Jo Aiken, conducted last year.

Out of a representative sample of 17 dissenters, they found that almost half had a strong Jewish background and identity, and were members of a synagogue.

Fifty percent of the respondents considered themselves Zionists and 13 out of 17 had visited Israel at least once.

Only two out of 17 were completely disaffected from Israel, and half had experienced discomfort with the non-Jewish left.

Nestel reported that their non-Establishment views were a source of sharp conflict within their families.

They also feel alienated from what she described as the community's material values.

Explaining the rationale for their study on dissent, she noted that the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising brought into relief the "increasingly brutal" nature of Israel's occupation and the "enormous suffering of the Palestinians."

Nestel said that "the Zionist dream" of attaining Jewish statehood was achieved at the expense of the Palestinians.

"The main challenge for Diaspora Jews is to come to grips with that reality."

Jews who disagree with Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip have greater difficulty than American Jews holding and propagating such alternative viewpoints because the Jewish community in Canada is more conservative, she observed.

But even in the United States, dissension can cause unintended results, she said, citing the case of a yeshiva teacher who lost his job because his son was a member of the International Solidarity Committee, a pro-Palestinian organization.

Islamic terror based on Qu'ran: ex-CIA official

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A former top official of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency paints a menacing picture of the relationship between Islam and terrorism.

"Islamic terrorism is based on Islam as revealed through the Qu'ran," keynote speaker Bruce Tefft claimed in a panel discussion at the University of Toronto on jihad and global terrorism. The session, held late last month, was sponsored by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center and the Speakers Action Group.

Tefft, a founder of the CIA's counter-terrorism center and now an advisor to the New York Police Department's intelligence and counter-terrorism divisions, said that without Islam, the long-term strategy of Al Qaeda and its followers make little sense.

Linking Osama bin Laden to the attacks against the World Trade Center and the Pentagon in 2001, Tefft said: "To pretend that Islam has nothing to do with Sept. 11 is to willfully ignore the obvious and to forever misinterpret events."

In a harsh indictment of Islam – the world's fastest growing religion and the second-largest faith after Christianity – Tefft said that while there may be moderate Muslims, Islam itself is immoderate.

And, he added, "There is no difference between Islam and Islamic fundamentalism, which is a totalitarian construct."

According to Tefft, the Qu'ran enjoins Muslims to believe that the whole world should be governed by the principles of Islam, an expansionist religion that has historically grown through conquest.

All infidels are to be converted, enslaved or killed, he said, drawing on the knowledge of Bernard Lewis, a Jewish historian who has written books about Islam and Islamic history.

Tefft, whose career at the CIA spanned 21 years, argued that Islam was a religion of peace and tolerance in its formative phase, but has since grown intolerant of non-Muslims.

Islam cannot be reformed because its teachings, as revealed through the Qu'ran, are regarded as the word of God, and to be a Muslim, a believer must accept the Qu'ran on a literal basis, Tefft said.

He said Islam views Judaism and Christianity as failed religions and itself as the only true religion.

Islamic terrorists are animated by passionate anti-Western convictions, Tefft argued. They blindly sacrifice their lives for the chance of going to paradise and enjoying the charms of 72 virgins.

To them, the United States is the epitome of evil, because its constitution separates church and state.

Tefft said Al Qaeda's 700-page training manual covers all aspects of terrorism, from surveillance to assassinations, and is drawn from U.S., Russian and Iranian manuals .

"They've compiled the best of the best."

Of the 6,000 or more mosques in North America, 80 per cent are radical in orientation and devoted to spreading an intolerant Wahabi strain of Islam. They are funded by Saudi Arabia, he said.

David Harris, the former head of strategic planning at the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, said that Islamic fundamentalists are hostile to Canada and consider it a "Little Satan."

He warned that Hezbollah has begun surveying sites in Canada for possible terrorist attacks.

Canada, though, innocently thinks it is immune to such aggression, Harris said.

John Thompson, the president of the MacKenzie Institute, a Canadian research organization, said Al Qaeda has a reservoir of recruits for at least a generation to come.

Tom Kay, the chief of police in Owen Sound and the immediate past president of the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police, said Canadian law enforcement agencies that combat terrorism are under-funded.

"We face complacency from people in power," he said, referring to Canadian politicians at all levels.

It is scandalous that more money is not being allocated to counter-terrorism efforts, Kay said.

Leo Adler, the director of national affairs for Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, urged Canada to be more resolute in fighting terrorism.

Rather than operating in a vacuum, Jihadists work with highly honed organizations that supply them with funds, logistical support and intelligence, Adler commented.

Christians are persona non grata, Farah says

Palestinian Christians once accounted for 20 per cent of the Arab population in the West Bank and Gaza. Today, they have been whittled down to only two per cent of the populace. "Christians are persona non grata," he said.

Farah explained that his views were formed by personal observation.

He said that when he went to the Middle East for the first time in 1981, he was even-handed and bought into the conventional wisdom that partition was the key to defusing the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"But what I found on the ground was startling: a Muslim population intent on destroying Israel. Jihad is the root cause [of the Arab-Israeli dispute]. Radical Islam hates Jews. As far as they're concerned, there is no room for Jews in the Middle East."

DID YOU KNOW MY FAMILY?

My name is Perry Sambor. I live in Melbourne, Australia.
I am looking for any family members who may have survived the Holocaust.

My grandfather – Lejb Sambor – was born and lived in Janow Lubelski, Poland. He was married there, to Ruchla Szteinberg, who came from Belzyce. They had four children:
Moszek: born in 1925 Serla: born in 1927
Pinkwas: born in 1930 Frajda: born in 1937

my father Moszek Sambor in 1949.

Lejb's son Moszek was my father. He survived the war and passed away one year ago in Australia. The fate of the others is unknown. Does anyone know what happened to them? During the occupation, they were deported from Janow to Belzyce. After this, my father was separated from them. The youngest child, Frajda, could have been left with a Polish family.
I am searching for any clues about the family – any information whatsoever – from those who may remember them before or during the war. Confidentiality is assured. If Frajda is still alive and does not know about her Jewish roots, I will respect that.

I discovered several years ago that my father had never been properly registered as a Holocaust survivor, even though he always thought he had been. He constantly thought about his family and his greatest wish was to find out what happened to them.

Arab totalitarians share belief in cult of death, says U.S. writer

European totalitarian ideas have seeped into the Arab world, an American writer told a forum on terrorism last week.

These concepts are derived from fascist and communist ideology as propounded by Adolf Hitler and Josef Stalin, Paul Berman, author of Terror and Liberalism, said in the last of four Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lectures at Holy Blossom Temple.

Berman, a specialist in revolutionary movements and their totalitarian dimensions, explained that Arab totalitarians want to create "a perfect society" and share a belief in the cult of death and the notion of martyrdom.

"Out of this came suicide bombers," he said.

Berman said the Muslim Brotherhood, founded in Egypt in 1928, and the Baath party, which governs present-day Syria, are movements that were inspired by European totalitarianism.

Speaking generally, he said the totalitarian movements of post-World War I Europe supplanted the liberalism that Europeans adopted in the 18th century.

Berman claimed that the insurgents currently battling U.S. and coalition forces in Iraq represent the forces of European-style fascist totalitarianism.

And yet most liberals, who largely opposed the 2003 invasion of Iraq, cannot understand this, he added.

In the run-up to the invasion, liberals did not grasp the fact that Iraqi president Saddam Hussein was a classic totalitarian leader.

Berman said liberals are confused, but he pointed out that in the past, they have been unable to face their totalitarian enemies.

Berman said that the U.S. military's effort to pacify Iraq is going "very, very badly."

He claimed that the United States and its allies invaded Iraq without a clear plan about what to do next. –S.K.

The unknown hero of Chanukah

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ

Rabbinic Reflections

The general story of Chanukah is well known even though we might be a bit hazy on the exact dates and all of the players. But one thing is sure – we know who the hero is. Most would consider Judah the Maccabee to head the list. It could be argued that if not for the tumult made by Mattathias or the martyrdom of Hannah and her seven sons, the stardom of Judah would not be shining so brightly.

But perhaps there is another hero who made the difference bayamim haheim (in those days) and continues to do so bazman hazeh (in our days) as well.

After the battle for religious independence was won and the Temple reclaimed, the victors sought to rekindle the menorah without delay. There was no pure oil to be found, except for one cruse. It would take seven days to make new oil, and this cruse was barely enough for one day.

But nonetheless they said, "Let's do it now." And, of course, miracle of miracles, this small cruse of oil lasted an extra full week, in honour of which we celebrate the eight days of Chanukah.

But how many days of miracle were there? The olive oil lasted the initial 24 hours, leaving a miracle requirement of only seven days. Even if you argue that only one-eighth was used each day, there was still enough for one day. So what is being celebrated on the first day of Chanukah?

Our celebration on that day is a tribute to the true hero of Chanukah. We acknowledge the unknown individual who hid away that singular cruse of oil, convinced that someone in the future would not only find it but, if need be, also search for it.

To believe in the future of the Jewish people and to act on that belief are worthy of celebration. Despite the darkness and bleakness of that Maccabean period, to provide for the future is an act of heroism. Our true hero of Chanukah was someone who, through his or her actions, demonstrated absolute faith in the Jewish future.

On Chanukah, when we think of Judah or Mattathias or Hannah, we also have to remember the many unknown individuals who hid away cruses of Jewish spirit and sensitivity upon which future generations were able to build. Chanukah is about the discovery of those many different Jewish sparks, left scattered throughout the generations, which can create a beautiful glow of Jewish pride and continuity. Chanukah enables the rediscovery of those sparks of the Jewish neshamah (soul) imbedded within each of us, just waiting to be released.

Maybe it was a parent or a bubbie or zaide, a teacher or a friend who planted a word or a thought or a special Jewish experience at one time that remained with us as a powerful memory. Chanukah is that time which enables the transformation of memory into action. Chanukah is the time of amazing discovery and celebration of the Jewishness we tend to hide.

This Chanukah, it is not too late to take Judaism out of the closet and kindle a vibrant menorah of Jewish life. The past created by many unknown heroes awaits our discovery and its celebration. We might well become one of those unknown heroes who create a Jewish tomorrow. So, do something heroic – light a candle, eat a latke, spin a dreidel – for today and especially for tomorrow. Be that unknown hero creating a Jewish future.

Marmur: a rich and rewarding life

Six Lives: A Memoir* by Dow Marmur, Key Porter Books (paperbound).

Dow Marmur served as rabbi of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple for 17 years – from 1983 to 2000. Initially, he had no intention of moving from Britain, where he had established an enviable reputation as community leader, teacher, author and ecumenist and where he was beloved by members of his North Western Reform congregation.

Books

Bernard Baskin

An amusing anecdote concerns his invitation, together with a small group, to one of the Queen's informal lunches at Buckingham Palace. Prince Philip asked him if he was about to become chief rabbi. "I mumbled something to the effect that it was quite unlikely. The duke said that as the Poles are occupying centre stage – Pope John Paul in Rome and Prime Minister Menachem Begin in Jerusalem, both born in Poland – perhaps my turn, also born in Poland, was next."

When the author informed friends that he was less then impressed with the Queen, he was advised to be enthusiastic about the encounter, unless he wanted to be sensationalized by the media. "I did as I was told and was quoted accordingly."

Canada, which he had never visited, offered a new challenge and religious perspective and "held the promise of achievement," Rabbi Marmur writes.

However, newly arrived in Canada, the rabbi didn't have an easy time. He asserts that it was only his skills as a teacher that saved him from losing his position. There were numerous objections.

"I was too cold and remote; I didn't smile enough; I was arrogant and standoffish; I irritated them when I fiddled with my tallit; I couldn't speak English properly and needed elocution lessons; I didn't know how to use the microphone; I didn't understand Canada; I didn't understand Reform Judaism; I didn't flatter them enough. One woman actually told me that she had been instrumental in getting rid of a [former rabbi] and if I didn't behave myself she'd do the same to me. Had I not had a successful career as a rabbi in Britain for more than two decades, I'd have been beside myself."

Unlike most of his colleagues, the author refused to accept a congregational contract. He informed the officers that he would agree to whatever they thought fair and proper. At first, he was disappointed.

"The offer I received was paltry, but I stood by my word. A few months later, a small delegation came to see me to tell me that the earlier offer was unfair. Would I accept an increase? My stance had been vindicated. I believe that the frequent contract negotiations between rabbis and congregations contribute much to the bad feelings between them. I didn't choose to be a rabbi in order to get rich."

Determined to introduce more tradition to the congregation, he successfully led a battle for a second day Rosh Hashanah service, an early Erev Shabbat "user friendly" style worship, and encouraged a head covering.

"Today, men who've remained bareheaded at services are probably in the minority and their number is decreasing. It's not unusual to see nowadays on the bimah a bareheaded grandfather, a son wearing a kippah and the grandson celebrating his bar mitzvah, or a granddaughter celebrating her bat mitzvah, wearing both kippah and tallit. And the congregation is still very much Reform."

Especially refreshing about Six Lives is the author's candour. Summing up his career, he says, "In the 38 years that I served congregations in Britain and Canada, I came to think of myself as a successful rabbi. I worked hard to bring Jews closer to Torah and mitzvot and to help them create viable and vibrant communities. I also tried to contribute to activities beyond my congregation as a writer, lecturer and social activist.

"As the interim director of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, I surmise that I was regarded, at least by Americans, as something of a schlemiel – because I didn't raise money. This wasn't the only reason I didn't enjoy my time with the organization. In the short period I tried to serve it, I also realized that I wasn't cut out to massage egos. I got used to speaking my mind without having to glance sideways all the time. What some would have regarded as the climax of rabbinic career, I considered an irrelevant diversion."

The volume's earlier chapters, which concern the author's rearing, family members, rabbinical training and a variety of vicissitudes faced in Poland, the Soviet Union and Sweden, are sprightly and engrossing.

Rabbi Marmur concludes his well-written, informative and forthright autobiography with these words, with which the reader will concur: "Mine has indeed been a rich and rewarding life. I thank God for it daily."

Jewish Life

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Friday, Israelis Aaron Ciechanover and Avram Hershko and American Irwin Rose will don white tie and tails. At approximately 4:30 pm, they will ascend a dais in Stockholm to be awarded the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for their work in the discovery of ubiquitin-mediated protein degradation. On that day, these three scientists will also enter an exclusive yet surprisingly large community of Jewish Nobel Prize winners.

You can shep nachas from the contributions these leaders have given to the world. The Jewish Virtual Library has put together a list of Jewish Nobel Prize winners since the Nobel Foundation of Sweden first awarded prizes for excellence in physics, medicine, chemistry, economics, literature and world peace. "Between 1901 and 2004, more than 740 Nobel Prizes were awarded. Of these, at least 155 are Jews." [http://tinyurl.com/68ttu] I should point out that these various sites are not always in agreement about the exact number of Jewish winners, nor do most explain how they determined the winners cited were Jewish.

• Albert Einstein in physics (1921), "for his services to theoretical physics, and especially for his discovery of the law of the photoelectric effect";

• Hans Adolf Krebs in medicine (1953), "for his discovery of the citric acid cycle";

• Shmuel Yosef Agnon in literature (1966), the first winner awarded for works in Hebrew "for his profoundly characteristic narrative art with motifs from the life of the Jewish people"; shared with Nelly Sachs "for her outstanding lyrical and dramatic writing, which interprets Israel's destiny with touching strength";

• Milton Friedman (1976) in economics, "for his achievements in... consumption analysis, monetary history and theory";

• Henry Kissinger (with Le Duc Tho, 1973);

• Menachem Begin (with Anwar Sadat, 1978);

Interestingly, Elie Wiesel's 1986 Nobel Prize was not in literature but in the peace category. "Elie Wiesel has emerged one of the most important spiritual leaders and guides in an age when violence, repression and racism continue to characterize the world." [http://nobelprize.org/peace/laureates/1986/]

You can read more about Wiesel and all the other winners at the excellent, official Nobel Prize website. Included are their biographies, their presentation speeches and their banquet (acceptance) speeches. This year's presentation ceremony will be webcast live and will be available later as a video. [http://nobelprize.org/]

Who's your favourite Jewish Nobel Prize winner? I'm not quite sure about the purpose of this site, but if you feel strongly about a winner, you can make your voice heard at Famous Jews Interactive. When I last checked it out, Albert Einstein was in the lead with 533 votes. Hot on the trail was Paul Ehrlich, 1908 Nobel Prize winner in medicine, for his work on immunity with 527 votes. [www.yahoodi.com/famous/nobel1.html]

When the Nobel Prize celebrated its centenary in 2002, the Jewish Bulletin of Northern Californian looked at the number of Jews who had been awarded the prize. "Jewish names appear 127 times on the list, about 18 per cent of the total. This is an astonishing percentage for a group of people who add up to 1/24th of one per cent of the world's population." [http://tinyurl.com/4zuc6]

Why have Jews excelled at the award? According to Uzi Arad, director of the Institute of Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Institute, in Herzliyah, Israel, "the reason for the disproportionate number of Jewish winners is the premium Jews have placed on learning and scholarship. The tradition of reflection and scholarship has sharpened the inquisitive Jewish mind. It takes an inquisitive, nonconformist mind to break into new areas and make discoveries." [http://tinyurl.com/3vrgp]

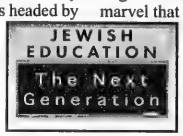
Chanukah's lesson for our time

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The Chanukah story is one that, from a young age, all Jewish kids can practically recite by rote. It usually goes like this: Chanukah celebrates the defeat of the Greek army in Israel by a relatively small band of Jewish fighters headed by the house of Hasmoneans (the paternal head of the clan, Matityahu, was succeeded after his death by the eldest son, Judah Maccabee). Subject to legislation that would ban the free practice of certain key Torah precepts, such as circumcision, the Maccabees rise up and uproot Greek control of Jewish centres of worship.



Although it commemorates the defeat of the Greek army under the command of Antiochus (in approximately 165 BCE), the holiday's real miracle is that in the Temple, only one bottle of pure oil – which ordinarily should have lasted 24 hours – could be found for the menorah, which had to be kept lit at all times.

This one bottle of oil lasted eight days, until new oil could replace it. Hence the custom among Jews is to light the menorah on each night of Chanukah, graduating to a climax of eight lights on the eighth and final night of the holiday. The Talmud shifts the emphasis away from the military rebellion against a force of greater number and power to the true marvel that the "light" of Torah continued to burn undiminished.

But as one gets older, the educational slant changes and deepens in complexity. One learns that the legacy of the Hasmoneans was less than glorious. The holiday becomes particularly poignant for our time, insofar as it illustrates the seduction of Jews by the considerable charms of Hellenistic culture, leading many to prefer a Greek (read, in our time, "Western") way of life to Jewish practice. The Maccabees represented the forces of tradition that opposed the "secularization" of Jews and Judaism. Chanukah is thus more powerfully understood as a civil war between Jews of different outlooks, a battle over the future of Jewish mores rather than as just one more fight against "the bad guys."

This battle, of course, rages in our time with ever greater significance. What we want Judaism to be and who gets to decide, in an era of tolerance and democratic values, places the image of Matityahu's slaying of a Jewish idolator (according to the Book of Maccabees) in a rather peculiar and even uncomfortable light.

But the challenge of other cultures, be they Greek or American, also presents Judaism with an opportunity to define itself more sharply, and has even given rise to outbursts of creative thinking in Jewish history. As Prof. Menachem Kellner has noted, Judaism only develops a systematic theology and a philosophical reflectiveness when it's confronted by other ways of thinking and is forced to defend what it stands for and what its end purpose is.

In many ways, this is a very positive development, as the encounter with outside cultures forces a constant Jewish reassessment and reawakening, something that must be at the very forefront of priorities for Judaism today. It is no longer a question of whether Judaism can survive modernity, but whether modernity can actually help Judaism thrive.

Looking beyond the 'right of return' rhetoric

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Recently, interim Palestinian leader and Palestinian Authority presidential candidate Mahmoud Abbas insisted on the "right of return" for Palestinian refugees to Israel. This sent a chill through Israel's supporters because the phrase signals the destruction of Israel as a Jewish state.

Some analysts argued that since Abbas has little popular support, he could not afford to appear weak on what has long been a central Palestinian demand, inculcated in generations of Palestinians languishing in refugee camps to this day. Abbas, they said, will have enough difficulty maintaining control over numerous antagonistic factions.

Others pointed out that Abbas shares the same ideology as the late PA president Yasser Arafat, which makes him a hardliner on the "right of return."

The Globe and Mail editorial "The rhetoric of return" (Nov. 26) recognized that Abbas' position threatens future negotiations: "The whole basis of a future deal between Israelis and Palestinians is the division of the Holy Land into two countries, one primarily Jewish, one primarily Arab. Israelis believe that by insisting on the right of return, the Palestinians are rejecting the very idea of partition and signaling that their real agenda is to overwhelm Israel and rule all of the Holy Land themselves. Given what Palestinian leaders have said and done over the years, that is not a conspiracy theory. If Mr. Abbas and the rest of the Palestinian leadership are serious about reaching a deal with Israel – and that is still far from clear – they must show they are willing to compromise on the right of return."

Mahmoud Abbas

In a review of former U.S. Mideast peace negotiator Dennis Ross's book The Missing Peace: The Inside Story of the Fight for Middle East Peace, Israeli historian Benny Morris wrote (in the New Republic, May 8) that at Camp David, in the summer of 2000, Arafat "insisted on an Israeli endorsement of the right of return of the refugees from 1948 and their descendants – some four million people – to Israeli territory."

Morris cited Ross telling the Palestinians after the collapse of Camp David: "Right of return to Israel means you do not believe in a two-state solution."

Still, Morris faulted Ross for failing to recognize Arafat's strategic rejection of Israel and for believing that those close to Arafat, like Abbas, are prepared to forgo the "right of return." Morris insisted they are not.

Wrote Morris: "At Camp David and ever since, the Palestinian leadership has not wavered in its demand that Israel accept the 'right of return' to all of historic Palestine… [I]n conformity with the idea that there is no historical connection between the Jewish people and the Land of Israel/Palestine, Arafat unswervingly demanded sole Palestinian sovereignty over Jerusalem's Temple Mount, or Haram al-Sharif, and he and his colleagues repeatedly backed this by denying the historical connection of the Jews to the site."

Morris noted that Ahmed Queria, the current PA prime minister (and chief negotiator at Camp David) also rejects any legitimate Jewish historical attachment to Israel.

Journalists must look beyond the rhetoric to find out where the Palestinian leadership actually stands on such key issues as "right of return." Mere talk about peace means little if it's not backed up by a willingness for genuine compromise.

One encouraging note was an Associated Press report (Ha'aretz, Dec. 1) that Abbas had ordered a halt to anti-Israel incitement in government-controlled media – incitement that, under Arafat's rule, had been allowed to go on unchecked, even during the Oslo period. An entire generation of Palestinians has been raised on anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda, which spills out not only from their media but also from schools and, especially, from mosques.

Israeli analysts, and even some Palestinians themselves, realize that reconciliation depends on an end to incitement. It also depends on an education process that emphasizes a realistic solution to the Palestinian refugee problem based on compensation and repatriation to a future Palestinian state, not to Israel.

Camp director loved children

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

John Bernstein, the longtime director of the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto and Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, died recently at age 86.

Born in Nikolaiev, Russia, in 1918, Bernstein and his family fled the Russian Revolution and settled in Paris.

During WWII, he served as a lieutenant in the French army, and escaped from a German PoW camp in 1943. He returned to France and continued to fight with the French Underground.

At the end of the war, Bernstein helped Holocaust survivors and displaced persons in Europe find family and homes, and helped hunt down former SS and Nazi officers. Later, he worked with the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) aiding refugees and helped many survivors reach Palestine.

After immigrating to Canada, he worked in Winnipeg's Jewish community and was later invited to direct the Jewish Camp Council in Toronto.

"That was when he was able to pursue his real dream of working with children," his son David sid.

When Bernstein came to Toronto in the early 1950s, he brought together a number of smaller camps and formed Camp Northland-B'nai Brith on Moose Lake near Haliburton. He also established camps near Barrie and Parry Sound to support mothers with younger children, as well as senior citizens, single parents and people with physical and intellectual disabilities.

"My father was absolutely and completely in love with children. He saw in them the future of all people, and always said we should focus our attention on them," David said.

As a father, he said, Bernstein was fairly liberal-minded. "If we had a good reason to do something, he would always listen to us."

David said that when his daughter told her grandfather she wanted to go to Camp White Pine instead of Camp Northland, he was very supportive. "He took her interests at heart and said it was important for her to be with her friends."

Bernstein also felt it was critical to be involved in the Jewish community.

"He brought children to camp who had literally just arrived in Canada with their parents. He wanted the parents to have a few weeks to settle in, and he wanted the children to have a chance to learn English and make friends."

He often brought staff over from Israel, David said, because he was staunchly pro-Israel, and he wanted campers and staff to learn about the country.

John Bernstein

"His fervour for Israel began after the war, when he witnessed what happened to people [at the hands of the Nazis].

After his father died, David said, former campers and staff from the 1950s and 1960s came to visit the family. "They told stories about camp, and they all credited dad for the effect camp had on them."

His father could not go anywhere without someone recognizing him from camp, David said. "Even if he didn't remember them, my father was able to say 'Hello' like he knew them. They always walked away beaming.

"He never looked for recognition, and although [he had a fascinating] life, he would never write his memoirs. 'People have better things to do than read about my life,' he would say."

Bernstein is survived by his wife of 48 years Dr. Vera-Rose Bernstein; son Michael and daughter-in-law Jeanne; son David and daughter Susan; daughter Suzy and son-in-law Paul Miller; and grandchildren Anna-Nora, Alysha, Laura, Emily and Brenden.

A pioneer in pediatric neurosurgery

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Pediatric neurosurgeon Harold Hoffman, a pioneer in surgical treatments for children with craniofacial disorders, epilepsy, brain tumours and spinal cord injuries, died last month, after a long battle with dementia. He was 72.

He is particularly well known as the surgeon who separated conjoined twins Nida and Hira Jamal in 1995.

The Jamal children were born in Pakistan in 1993. Joined at the head, their future in a country with less-than-ideal medical services was grim.

Hoffman and his team at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children separated the twins in a gruelling 16-hour procedure. While Nida died of a heart attack a month later, Hira recovered well.

Harold Hoffman

Although he is probably best known for his work with the Jamal children, Hoffman's accomplishments in the field of pediatric neurosurgery are legion.

After graduating from the University of Toronto's medical school, he joined the staff of the Hospital for Sick Children in 1964.

He wrote extensively on various aspects of pediatric neurosurgery, and created a library of more than 40,000 slides based on his clinical work, which have now been digitized and placed on U of T's neurosurgery website.

He designed new equipment, such as two types of shunt devices for hydrocephalus; the Hoffman T-tube lumbo-peritoneal shunt; and, together with colleague Fred Epstein, one of the world's first uni-shunts to avoid problems of shunt disconnections and breakages.

He travelled extensively throughout the world to speak about his work, including to Thailand, Japan, South Africa, the United States and most of the countries in Europe.

In 1986, he was appointed neurosurgeon-in-chief at the Hospital for Sick Children for a 10-year term.

In honour of his achievements and his international reputation, the Harold J. Hoffman/Shoppers Drug Mark chair in pediatric neurosurgery was established at the Hospital for Sick Children in 1998, the year of his retirement.

Many students from all over the world came to study under Hoffman over the years. Hoffman's widow, JoAnn, said that she and her husband welcomed new trainees from overseas to their home, and took them and their families to their cottage on Lake Simcoe.

They also befriended the families of patients from far-off countries who came to avail themselves of Hoffman's talents.

He was very interested in helping children from Israel. With the help of Toronto's Azriel Reichman, he brought many to Toronto for treatment.

One of his prized possessions was a plaque giving the names of all the Israeli children he helped. It was inscribed, "Thank you wholeheartedly for performing miracles and saving our lives.With all our love and appreciation. Children of Israel."

JoAnn Hoffman said that while her husband had always loved art, after his retirement from the hospital, he discovered his own talent for painting in oils, and reveled in it.

He painted some 20 pictures, which now hang in his family's homes and in the family cottage.

Hoffman grew up in a strong socialist circle, which included such United Jewish Peoples' order stalwarts as J.B. Salsberg, Mary and Sam Harris, and Sam and Manya Lipshitz. His first language was Yiddish.

Tragically, shortly after his retirement, he began showing signs of dementia. By 2000, he was disabled.

Tour to Israel planned for Israeli war veterans

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A tour to Israel has been planned for Israeli war veterans from all the wars in Israel, and Machalniks – those who went to Israel to fight in the War of Independence – as well as members of their families and people in the community.

They will participate in the government ceremonies for Yom Hazikaron, and celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut during a 10-day planned program from May 8 to May 19.

Stern arrived in Israel during the War of Independence and served in the Zahal, the forerunner to the Israel Defence Force (IDF).

He also served in the Sinai War in 1956 in the Signal Corps.

"I was only 17½ when I came to Israel in the summer of 1948 during the war. Although I was too young, they took me as a volunteer into the army because I could operate and repair radio communications equipment."

Living in Toronto for the past 34 years, Stern says, "It was my idea to bring together this group for Independence Day.

"Some of the veterans have died, others are disabled, so I decided to plan a trip now. My hope is that children and grandchildren, and those who have lost their spouses, will join us."

The itinerary includes many sites in and around Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and the Golan Heights. They will visit Kfar Haruv to see the Sea of Galilee from its eastern side and visit Kibbutz Lavi.

The highlights of the trip include participating in the official ceremonies of Yom Ha'atzmaut, visiting the new Palmach Museum, and going to an army base, Derech Burma, to see where the young men in the IDF broke the siege of Jerusalem.

Stern said that the idea for the tour came to him earlier in the year when he saw Canadian war veterans on television who were going to France to celebrate D-Day and the 60th anniversary of the Battle of Normandy.

"I thought, why don't we do this for our veterans and their families?

"I believe this is the first trip organized for Israeli war veterans. Along with touring, we will meet with representatives of the Israeli government."

Stern says he has been "searching for names of the veterans or their family members as I don't have a complete list. I would like to hear from anyone who can help me."

Rabbi Wayne Allan, senior rabbi of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, will accompany the tour.

"My wife Judy and my son Paul hope to come along with my grandchildren, and I hope other families will also participate."

He adds that "we will accommodate people with disabilities."

Young cellist wins Royal Conservatory silver medal

By ALISA MITCHELL
Special to The CJN

Each year the Royal Conservatory of Music awards a silver medal to students who achieve the highest mark in each musical category and grade. This year the silver medal in cello, at the Grade 8 level, was awarded to Beth Silver of Richmond Hill.

For Beth, 13, playing the cello has been an integral part of daily life for the past nine years. She spends Saturdays taking lessons with her teacher, Barbara Pepper, and rehearsing as a principal in the Mooredale Youth Orchestra. Each week night she practises for an hour and an half and does her homework.

Although music is a time-consuming commitment for someone so young, Beth finds her hard work rewarding. "It makes me feel special," she said. "When I am having a bad day, it raises my hopes and makes me feel great that I have something that I am good at. If I wasn't good, I wouldn't keep going."

Beth showed her interest in music at a young age. Her parents, Robin and Carla, said they noticed her fascination with music on the radio at the age of two. However, her mother, a music teacher, was particularly surprised when at the age of four, completely on her own initiative, Beth requested cello lessons, when neither parents had any special familiarity with string instruments. Nevertheless, they were delighted at their daughter's curiosity and Beth has been playing ever since.

Beth plays mainly classical and romantic pieces. Yet, not surprisingly, like many teenaged musicians, Beth also likes to play contemporary pop and rock music. Even though the cello is not commonly found in the songs on today's top hit lists, Beth says that she loves to sit in her living room and learn how to play her favourites by ear. "I recently taught myself all the music from the movie Pirates of the Caribbean," she said, grinning.

Beth's strong commitment to Judaism has also instilled in her an interest in Jewish music. She performs at the weddings and at the bar and bat mitzvahs of family and friends as well as at her synagogue, Temple Emmanuel. Her cello playing has become an annual tradition at Kol Nidrei services and she plays at the synagogue's children's services.

Beth attends Baythorn Arts Elementary School, where she is in Grade 8. Besides playing the cello, she takes drama classes, tennis, swimming and soccer lessons, goes to Hebrew school and likes to paint with her 10-year-old sister Amy.

Despite her age, Beth cannot imagine life without the cello. The cello's uniqueness fuels her passion for and interest in the instrument, she said. "There are so many pianists in the world, but there are only a few cellists my age, especially in a place like Richmond Hill."

Still, Beth said that she tries to be modest about her talent and doesn't like to brag to her friends. "I haven't even told anyone about the award," she admitted before she received the silver medal at a ceremony held at the end of November.

Beth dreams about going to the Juilliard School in New York City to study music and, eventually, perhaps to play the cello professionally. Nevertheless, she said those are things she will think about more in the future. For now, she wants to continue being a regular teenager who "is just good at playing the cello. Everyone has their special talent, this is mine."

Teen launches own business

Like many other 17-year-olds, Matthew Gitter attends high school and lives at home with his family. But this Toronto teen has something that most of his peers don't – his own successful business.

Gitter started the Computer Medic, a computer consulting and repair company, in the summer of 2004 as part of the Ontario government's Young Entrepreneurs Summer Company Program. He says the idea for this company came from his own experience with computers, which his father introduced him to at the age of five. He describes the growing frustration he felt at not having access to a computer service that could provide instant and efficient help when he needed it.

"I know what it is like to be sitting at home frustrated with no one to call," he says. "So I decided to do something about it and create a company that could provide instant help."

Gitter is trained in computer repair and provides services that include system diagnostic tests, network support, virus and spyware removal and limited data recovery. He also sells computers and offers repair services for the products he sells.

He found the Summer Company Program while searching for a summer job on the Internet last spring. The program provides qualified Ontario students between the ages of 15 and 29 a $1,500 grant towards the startup costs of their company. The participants are eligible to receive an additional $1,500 at the end of the summer upon fulfilling certain expected requirements. Each participant is also expected to attend business training sessions and is put under the supervision of a mentor from within the business community.

Gitter attended several workshops that taught him the fundamentals of starting and owning a business and was placed under the direction of a consultant from the Richmond Hill Small Enterprise Centre.

Gitter's consultant, Stephanie Ward, says he took full advantage of the mentoring services available to him. Specifically, Ward says, he sought help on how to market his company resourcefully, which she says is one of the most important skills that young entrepreneurs must learn.

Ward stresses how beneficial this program can be for students like Gitter, teaching the essentials of starting up and operating a business. While it is inevitable that many of the students will go on to do different things in their careers, she says, the skills they acquire from this program will continue to benefit them later.

Gitter says the experience has been extraordinary, providing him with the opportunity to become a successful businessman while still in his teens. It has also enabled him to serve his community and earn some money doing something he loves.

Vancouver's Jewbilation brings fun to fundraising

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — A recent 2004 CJA campaign event showed that it's possible to raise money for the community and have fun doing it.

Jewbilation, which took place Nov. 14 at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, combined a coin drive, which raised an estimated $5,000, and a jamboree talent show. More than 1,700 members of the Lower Mainland Jewish community, ranging in age from one month to 92 years, took part.

CJA campaign associate Shanna Tator, who organized Jewbilation, said the day has antecedents in two earlier campaign events.

"It evolved out of the Super Sunday telethon and Family Affair Day, which followed Super Sunday," Tator said. "Neither of these events was appropriate for a Jewish community which is quite small and mostly unaffiliated."

Tator decided to call the event "Jewbilation" in order to attract a broader cross-section of the diverse Lower Mainland Jewish community.

"The purpose of Jewbilation was to create passion and excitement in our community around [the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver] and our campaign," Tator said. "That's a hard sell, as you can imagine."

Jewbilation had three main objectives: to inspire people who are normally not involved to raise money for the campaign; to bring the Greater Vancouver Jewish community together in a fun atmosphere to support federation; and to highlight the agencies that federation supports.

A month before Jewbilation, brochures and "Coins for Community" bags were mailed out to promote the event and to encourage recipients to fill their bags with coins. The goal was to collect six million coins, to match the main campaign's goal of $6 million. Tator and other campaign staff visited the Jewish schools in the Lower Mainland to promote the coin drive.

"The buzz this created was outstanding," Tator said. "Everyone was rushing to fill their bags, because each bag that was brought to Jewbilation was entered in a draw to win a new Norco bike."

Jewbilation also featured a talent show.

"This was our first community-wide talent contest," Tator said. "It was such a popular event, because kids and adults almost never get the opportunity to perform in front of a large and diverse audience."

Performers, who ranged in age from seven to 35, included dancers, martial artists, singers, piano players, jugglers, magicians and an eight-year-old Elvis impersonator.

Tator said other federations in Canada and the United States should consider copying Jewbilation.

"Everyone who has worked in Jewish communal service knows how difficult it is to associate fun with federation fundraising," she said.

"Whether your city has an enormous Jewish population or a very small one, the Jewish federation needs to be an organization that, in addition to its yearly campaign, is associated with fun, community, creativity, passion and excitement. This is our only way to ensure positive support of what we do for generations to come."

Tator hails from Toronto, where she was raised in a religiously and culturally observant Jewish family.

"My grandmother, bubbie Sara, who is a Holocaust survivor, taught me the importance of Jewish continuity," she said. "[She influenced] my professional career to be exclusively dedicated to Jewish communal work."

SHARING CHANUKAH: The students of the Montessori Jewish Day School received a certificate of appreciation from Karen Paikin of Jewish Family and Child Services, acknowledging the heap of new toys and gift certificates that their families donated as part of "Sharing Chanukah".

The latter was adopted by the General Assembly by a 104-7 margin, with 63 abstentions, but Canada joined Israel, the United States, Australia and three small Pacific Ocean nations in opposing it.

Canada explained that it opposed the measure "due to serious reservations about the committee's work and objectives."

Nasser al-Kidwa, the Palestinian observer at the UN, said he "regretted" Canada's negative vote.

The CIC said Canada's new tack helps "correct a fundamental dysfunction of the UN, which is reflected in the continued and systematic abuse and isolation of Israel within international institutions."

At the same time, though, Canada said it would support a resolution on the risk of nuclear proliferation in the Middle East. It had abstained on the measure in previous years.

Rock said the resolution "is consistent with the Canadian government's nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation policy and ongoing non-proliferation efforts in the region."

But the CIC believes Canada's support for the measure singles Israel out and is "inconsistent with Canada's Middle East policy. It also violates this country's core values of fairness and balance."

A CIC analysis calls the resolution "fundamentally biased and unproductive" because it fails to mention attempts by other Mideast countries to develop nuclear capabilities, such as Iran and Iraq; it fails to acknowledge Israel's "unique security imperatives that result from the constant threats posed by their neighbours, like Iran"; and it fails to concede that Iran and Iraq were able to develop weapons programs "under the nose" of international regulators.

Twenty-two resolutions are expected to be voted on at the UN's annual session on "The Question of Palestine," which could last into January.

Last Wednesday, Canada voted in favour of three resolutions that support programs for information on issues related to the Palestinians, Jerusalem and the peaceful settlement of the "question of Palestine."

The resolution on Jerusalem, which has not changed from previous years, opposes any actions by Israel to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the city while its status is yet to be settled by negotiations.

The votes were not regarded as departures from Canadian policy.

But by "demonstrating a renewed commitment to balance and evenhandedness" with its opposition votes, "Canada will be able to play a larger and more credible role in post-Arafat Middle East peacemaking, based on Prime Minister [Paul] Martin's new Middle East initiative," CIC national chair Marc Gold said.

David Goldberg, the CIC's director of research, said Canada's stance should be viewed as a small but positive beginning.

"We never anticipated Canadian voting behaviour to change overnight. It's gradual. It's slow, but we are happy with the start."

Though Ottawa was abuzz last week with stories of internal conflict over a perceived shift in policy toward Israel, the CIC said the "adjustment" simply ensures "that Canada's Middle East policy is more properly reflected in its UN voting behaviour."

Goldberg echoed that sentiment, saying Ottawa is beginning to recognize that there's been "very little correspondence between the way Canada has voted [at the UN] in the past, and Canadian policy and values."

In his remarks to the UN, Rock stressed that Canada's votes do not signal a change in course on the Middle East, but are "yet another example of Canada's new multilateralism.

"The fundamental elements of my country's policy in the Middle East are unshakable. Support for Israel, especially its right to live in peace with its neighbours within secure boundaries, has been at the core of Canada's Middle East policy since 1948."

At the same time, Canada's support for the creation of a Palestinian state is "unwavering. However, the legitimate aspirations of both Israelis and Palestinians have been thwarted by the violence that continues to plague the region and by major issues that remain unresolved."

Rock added, though, that Israel's ongoing military actions and the security barrier that encroaches on territories "it continues to occupy will not, in our judgment, give Israel long-term security.

"On the other hand, a just peace will never be achieved through suicide bombing attacks targeting Israeli civilians… Effective action by the Palestinian Authority to dismantle terrorist capability and infrastructure are essential steps toward statehood."

The time has come, he said, "especially given renewed hope for the peace process, to evaluate the efforts that all of us make at the United Nations to determine if they could be re-directed toward more constructive outcomes."

Rock's announcement was the latest development amid several months of speculation that Canada has shifted to a more pro-Israel position.

In the House of Commons last week, Toronto-area Liberal MP Derek Lee said Rock's statements and Canada's votes at the UN "may have left an impression that Canada has changed its longstanding policy toward the Middle East. Some say it may show a pro-Israeli shift."

Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew responded that Canada's policy toward the Middle East has not changed.

"It continues to be fair-minded and based on principles. Again, we review each resolution with a view to ensuring that our voting position is consistent with our policy. Our approach with these 22 resolutions is to assess them on their merits."

The CIC's Goldberg said Canada's new stance at the UN should not affect its offer to help the Palestinians oversee their Jan. 9 election of a new president.

Jewish Foundation exec. director retires

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — David Cohen, retiring executive director of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, admitted to being a little overwhelmed when he responded to the accolades he had just received at what turned out to be a bit of a surprise party.

"My assistant, Marj [Wiebe], only told me what was happening tonight on a need-to-know basis." he noted.

The party at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue was organized by Wiebe, Lillian Neaman and Henny Corrin, as a tribute to Cohen who has served 14 years as the JFM's executive director.

Cohen's longtime friend, Gerry Cohen, spoke of his friend's many talents and passions – art and music, bowling and poker — and his devotion to family and friends.

In his usual unassuming way, Cohen shifted the spotlight to others. He introduced each member of his staff, listed the five individuals who served as president during his 14-year tenure at the foundation and introduced his predecessor Izzy Peltz, who was also in the audience.

He especially praised his wife and partner in community work, Maurene – who is soon retiring as director of volunteers at the Jewish Child and Family Service – and his parents, the late Moishe and Edith Cohen, for setting an example in community service.

"The Cohen family's history of community involvement began in 1927 when our parents, Moishe Cohen and Edith Dreman, were part of the group that founded the Jewish Public Library," he noted. "They married three years later."

Moishe Cohen was best known as the executive director of the I.L. Peretz Folk School for more than 40 years, while Edith worked on behalf of the muter farein (the PTA equivalent) for all those years.

Cohen noted that his younger brother, Ben Zion Kerem, who made aliyah in 1961, has also carried on the family tradition of community service. He recently retired as deputy director for services for the elderly in Israel.

Kerem and his wife Nurit Lieber, flew in especially for the evening, as did David and Maurene's sons Eli and Aaron; Aaron's wife Raquel Rotnes; their daughter Ma'ayan; and Raquel's children, Naomi and David.

In a poignant moment, Cohen recalled Lisa, his daughter who died in her early 20s.

Cohen attended Peretz School, Machray and St. John's High School and belonged to Habonim Dror and Hashomer Hatzair. In his life before the Jewish Foundation, he worked as a grain trader for Dreman and Company.

He was also involved in the community. Marcia Cowan noted that he was active in 10 different organizations and held seven volunteer positions, including the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, the Winnipeg Jewish school system, Folklorama, the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble.

He inherited an organization with $10 million in capital assets and 593 funds. Under his leadership, the foundation's capital assets have grown to nearly $48 million and more than 3,000 funds, making the JFM the second largest private foundation in Manitoba.

Almost 11,000 people are listed in the foundation data base.

The Cohen's initial plan immediately after retirement is to spend a couple of months in Hawaii.

Cohen said he has plans for three new projects, "the details of which will be revealed in good time."

Anti-Israel display permitted by UWO officials

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Students walking into University of Western Ontario's community centre last week found a mock wall pulled across the atrium.

The banner, which remained on campus for the entire day, was erected by Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) for Palestine Day, and displayed grafitti that included, "Stop Killing Children," "Stop the Genocide" and "Another South Africa."

The University Community Centre houses campus food outlets, shops, recreation facilities and student-related services. According to the university's calendar, 20,000 people pass through the centre daily.

"It was a pretty uncomfortable situation," said Hailey Eisen, a UWO journalism graduate student.

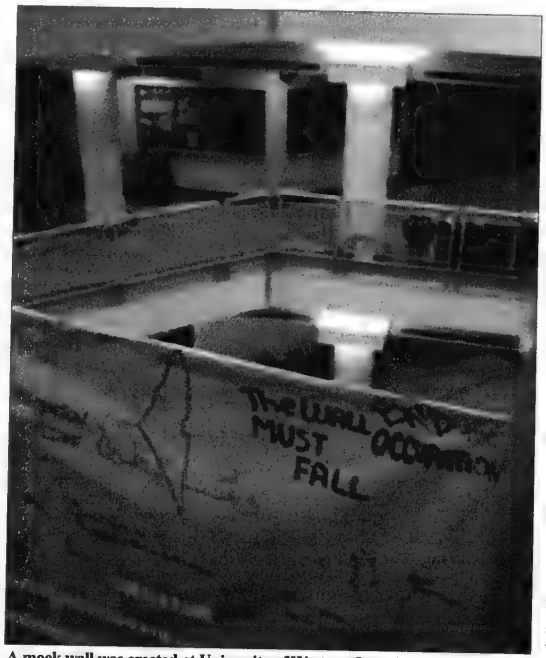
"The banner claimed to be about human rights, but there was no neutrality and no mention of terrorism against Israeli civilians," she said.

"While there is definitely a need for dialogue between the two groups, this wasn't the way to initiate discussion. I watched people screaming at each other all day. Everybody was on the defensive right from the beginning," Eisen said.

Toby Abramsky, vice-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, who is also a mother of two students at Western, has written a letter to university president Paul Davenport asking the university to intervene in order to ensure that the campus is welcoming for all students.

"We are deeply disappointed by the decision of the University Student Council to have permitted this display to remain on campus," Abramsky wrote, pointing out that in January 2004 the Israel Action Committee (IAC) was asked to withdraw flyers because they were deemed to be offensive to some students.

At that time, the IAC complied, issued a full apology and took full responsibility for their actions. Yet over the past year, Jewish students and supporters of Israel have found themselves offended by anti-Israel propaganda that has appeared on campus that compares Israelis to Nazis.



A mock wall was erected at University of Western Ontario for Palestine Day.

"Nonetheless, the IAC entered into a verbal agreement with the USC [University Student Council] and SPHR to refrain from any confrontational and potentially offensive advocacy," the letter stated.

"IAC and Hillel have scrupulously adhered to this agreement. It is apparent with yesterday's events that SPHR has not," the letter said.

"The implicit comparisons of Israel to South Africa and Israelis/Jews to practitioners of apartheid can only contribute to a poisoned campus environment where Jewish students and supporters of Israel will feel that they are unsafe and unwelcome."

Eric Johannson, USC vice-president of campus issues, said that the mock wall was "allowed to remain because it wasn't explicitly racist or harassing."

An officer from the hate crimes unit was present and said that the wall was legal. Furthermore, the wall didn't break any of our current policies and regulation, Johannson said.

However, "we're going to have a board of directors meeting and discuss whether our policies or regulations need to be adjusted or changed."

"I've read many e-mails and gotten the message from a large portion of our student body. We take those messages very seriously," he said.

Cookies ready to serve to your guests

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

When it comes to Chanukah, you can never have enough cookies to serve to the family and friends who drop by to share the festivities.

When making roll-out cookies you should mix the ingredients together carefully and quickly. Do not overbeat the dough or you will have tough, rubbery cookies. Always chill the dough for at least half an hour before rolling it out. This prevents the dough from being too sticky to roll.

Divide the dough into halves or thirds for faster chilling. If the dough is too stiff to roll out, let it stand at room temperature until it softens a bit. To save time, you can chill the dough in the freezer for 20 minutes. You can also freeze the dough for up to three weeks if you like to plan ahead.

Rolled cookies should be thin and crisp, so generally, the dough should be rolled to a 1/8 in.-thickness. The rule is the thinner they are, they are more crispy and fragile. But if you want bigger cookies that are on the chewy side, roll them thicker and under-bake them just a little bit. Remove the cookies from the oven while the centre is still a little soft.

STAINED-GLASS COOKIES

2 1/2 cups flour
3/4 tsp. salt
3/4 cup unsalted butter or margarine, softened
3/4 cup sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. vanilla
6 to 8 oz. individually wrapped assorted fruit-flavored hard candies such as sour balls

In a bowl whisk together the flour and salt and set it aside. Place the butter and sugar in the bowl of an electric mixer and mix until it's pale and fluffy, about 3 minutes. Add the egg and vanilla and mix to combine.

Add the flour mixture to the egg mixture and mix at low speed until just combined. Divide the dough into 3 separate balls, cover with plastic wrap and chill until firm (at least 2 hours). While the dough chills, unwrap the candies and separate them by color in small, heavy-duty sealable plastic bags.

Seal the bags, forcing out air, then coarsely crush candies by wrapping each bag in a kitchen towel and pounding bags with a rolling pin. Preheat oven to 350. Roll out 1 piece of dough into a 9-inch round (1/8 in. thick) on a well-floured surface with floured rolling pin (keep remaining dough chilled).

Cut out as many cookies as possible from dough with large cutter and transfer to a parchment-lined baking sheet, arranging about 1 inch apart. Cut out centres from cookies with small cutter and add to scraps. Spoon about 1/2 to 1 tsp. crushed candy (depending on size of cutout) in centre of each cookie.

Bake the cookies in middle of oven until edges are golden, 10 to 12 minutes, then cool cookies completely on baking sheet on a rack, about 10 minutes. Transfer with a metal spatula to a plate or an airtight container. Gather scraps and chill until firm enough to reroll, 10 to 15 minutes. Make more cookies with remaining dough and scraps (reroll once) in same manner on cooled baking sheet.

CITRUS CUT OUT COOKIES

1 cup shortening
2/3 cup sugar
2 eggs
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. orange extract
3/4 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tsp. almond extract
2 1/2 cups flour, sifted

In a large bowl, cream together the shortening, sugar, eggs, salt, orange extract, vanilla extract and almond extract. Blend in flour, mix until mixture becomes a smooth dough. Remove the dough from the bowl, divide in half, cover the balls with plastic wrap and refrigerate overnight.

When ready to bake, preheat the oven to 375. Grease two cookie sheets with non stick vegetable spray. Roll out dough between two sheets of wax paper to about 1/4 in. in thickness. Cut out the cookies, and place on the greased cookie sheets. Bake for 8 to 12 minutes, until the edges are golden brown. Makes 2 to 2 1/2 dozen cookies depending on the size of the cookie cutter.

CUT OUT PEANUT BUTTER COOKIES

2/3 cup shortening
1 cup peanut butter
1 cup sugar
1 cup packed brown sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
3 cups flour
1 tsp. baking soda

In large mixer bowl, cream together shortening and peanut butter. Gradually add sugars blending well. Add eggs, one at a time, beating until smooth. Add vanilla. Set aside. Combine flour and baking soda. Stir in peanut butter mixture.

Divide dough into two parts. Wrap the dough in plastic wrap and chill for at least 1/2 hour. Preheat oven to 350. Roll the dough on lightly floured surface or on parchment paper and cut into the desired shapes. Bake for 8 to 10 minutes or until lightly browned. Remove the cookies from the cookie sheets and cool completely.

CUT OUT CHOCOLATE COOKIES

1/2 cup butter or margarine
3/4 cup sugar
1 egg
1 tsp. vanilla
1 1/2 cups all purpose flour
1/3 cup unsweetened cocoa
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt

In large mixer bowl beat butter, sugar, egg and vanilla until well blended. In medium bowl, stir together the flour, cocoa, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Add the butter mixture to the flour mixture and blend well. Refrigerate the dough for about 1 hour or until firm enough to roll.

Preheat oven to 325. On lightly floured surface or parchment paper, roll out dough. Bake 5 to 7 minutes or until no indentation remains when touched. Remove from cookie sheets and cool completely.

Note: All of the above cookies can be kept, layered between sheets of wax paper or parchment paper, in an airtight container at room temperature for 1 week or in the freezer for 3 weeks.

CRISPY CHOCOLATE CUT-OUT COOKIES

From Southern Living

1 (12-oz.) package semisweet chocolate morsels
1/2 cup peanut butter
2 cups crisp rice cereal
1 1/2 cups peanuts
1 1/2 cups miniature kosher marshmallows
2 (2 oz.) chocolate bark coating squares, melted
white nonpareils (optional)

Microwave chocolate morsels in a large glass bowl at high for 2 minutes or until melted, stirring every 30 seconds. Stir in peanut butter, stirring until well blended. Stir in the cereal, peanuts, and marshmallows. Line a 13 x 9-inch pan with foil. Lightly grease the foil. Press the mixture into foil-lined pan. Drizzle with chocolate. Sprinkle with white nonpareils, if desired. Let stand 1 hour or until firm; cut with 2-inch cookie cutters. Store cookies in an airtight container or place in a candy box.

Note: White nonpareils (tiny decorative beads) are available in cake decorating shops or large supermarkets. Makes 1 dozen cookies

Ottawa must still do more at UN

By MARC GOLD

Sometimes, deciding on whether to describe the glass as half full or half empty depends on how much water remains in the pitcher.

Over the last few weeks, the pro-Israel community has heard some very encouraging words from the prime minister.

Last week, we finally saw some of that translated into tachlis. Ambassador Allan Rock issued a sharp condemnation of the UN's continuing efforts to isolate and de-legitimize Israel within the international community.

For the first time in many years, the critique was backed by changes to Canada's vote on important resolutions, the introduction of unambiguous EOV's (explanations of vote) and the provision of notice that Canada will move even more aggressively in the future if the UN system is not responsive to Canada's concerns.

These developments are welcome… as far as they go. And, while the expression of appreciation to the government is appropriate, we should not lose sight of how much more must be done in order to rehabilitate the UN and the responsibility of Canada to assume a leadership role in that effort.

Canada's failure to take a principled stand on the real sources of regional instability (what is referred to as the NPT resolution) for example, unfairly portrays Israel as a nuclear menace – to the exclusion of known nuclear-capable states like India and Pakistan who are also non-signatories of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Moreover, it serves to deflect attention from Iran, which represents an unchecked nuclear risk to the region and beyond.

The UN is but one dimension or expression of Canada's Middle East orientation. And while Canada has demonstrated a more purposeful posture, this by itself does not constitute anything other than a modest, albeit positive, recalibration of the Canadian approach.

In order for the new resolve claimed by the Canadian government to really establish some traction, we would have to see meaningful progress on the bilateral front. Early renewal of CIIRDF, the high-tech agreement that just marked its 10th anniversary; increased ministerial visits including a high-level trade mission; and adjustment of the Foreign Affairs-authored "travel advisory" are but a few of the tangible initiatives that would represent true and meaningful application of Canadian policy.

While we may not yet be able to draw definitive conclusions about the scope, depth or lasting power of this new resolve, we can be certain that it represents one important development: "Canada wants to be a player."

The new direction signaled by recent events is that the prime minister is serious about becoming more fully engaged in contributing to Middle East peace in the post-Arafat era. For Canada to be a credible partner – especially in the eyes of the Israelis and Americans – these kind of developments must serve as the foundation of Paul Martin's "new Middle East initiative." Ensuring that Canada "stays the course" it has charted over this last period of time represents our challenge. If we are successful, it will represent a "win" all the way around. Let's reach for the pitcher and fill that glass.

דברים לא כל כך טובים

Israeli 'spy' comes home

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — In the Middle East, nothing signals rapprochement quite like a prisoner release.

So when Azzam Azzam returned to Israel on Sunday after Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak reduced his 15-year jail sentence for espionage by half, he brought with him a new sense of diplomatic goodwill that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon hopes will last through next year's Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

"I feel like I've been born anew," Azzam, 41, shouted to reporters as he was driven across the border to Eilat, and on to his hometown of Marar in Israel's Galilee.

In return, Israel freed six Egyptian students who were caught sneaking into Israel from the Sinai last August and accused of planning to kill soldiers and rob a bank.

"This humanitarian gesture will contribute to strengthening relations between Egypt and Israel," a statement from Sharon's office quoted him telling Mubarak.

According to Jerusalem officials, the prisoner swap was agreed upon during a visit last week by Egypt's intelligence chief, Omar Suleiman, who has been a key power broker during the last four years of Israeli-Palestinian fighting.

As the first Arab nation to recognize Israel under the 1979 Camp David peace treaty, Egypt has been particularly uneasy about the stalled international efforts to achieve Palestinian statehood in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

After Sharon announced his plan to quit Gaza by the end of next year, Egypt offered to supply advisers to ensure Hamas and fellow Islamist groups do not take over the coastal strip and destabilize the entire region. After former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat died last month, Egypt won Palestinian sympathy by hosting his state funeral.

"Releasing Azzam is Mubarak's way of showing he is serious about being a key Israeli ally for settling the Palestinian issue now that Arafat is gone," one Israeli official told JTA.

That might be cold comfort for Azzam, who spent the last eight years in a nine-square-foot Egyptian prison cell while insisting on his innocence.

A Druse textile merchant, Azzam was arrested while on a business trip to Egypt in November 1996 and accused of industrial espionage. Prosecutors said he tried to pass the Mossad classified information imprinted in women's underwear in invisible ink. Israel denied the allegation.

"As I said then – not publicly, but to Mubarak – Azzam Azzam had nothing to do with the Mossad or any other intelligence or security agency," former Mossad chief Danny Yatom told Israel Radio.

Refusing to back down from its charges, Egypt said it released him out of consideration for his poor health.

There are still many issues to work out before Israeli-Egyptian ties become more than just a cold peace.

Egypt, which withdrew its ambassador from Tel Aviv in solidarity with the Palestinian armed uprising launched in September 2000, has yet to return the diplomat, although the director general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, Ron Prushor, told Israel Radio on Sunday morning that Egypt is likely to return its ambassador to Israel in the near future.

And despite the more than three decades that have passed since there was open conflict between the two countries, Israel remains deeply suspicious of Egyptian offers to station troops along their demilitarized border in order to stop arms smuggling to Palestinian terrorist groups in Gaza.

"There are important things that still must change," said the chairman of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, Yuval Steinitz. "Arms smuggling from the Sinai, incitement on Egyptian television and Egypt's military buildup under a doctrine of a future conflict with Israel – all this must change."

Iran and Hezbollah trying to undermine renewed peace efforts

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Iran and Hezbollah have intensified their efforts to operate in the West Bank and Gaza and in Israel itself in order to undermine the possible renewal of the diplomatic process between Israel and the Palestinians by ensuring that no ceasefire agreement takes effect.

The two have recently focused on recruiting dozens of individuals from West Bank groups such as the Tanzim, and Gaza Strip groups such as the Popular Resistance Committee.

Israel has arrested 19 Palestinian activists recruited or controlled by the Iranian Revolutionary Guard. In addition, security services have indicated that Hezbollah has been smuggling weapons and other military equipment through tunnels connecting the Sinai to the Gaza Strip.

For some time, Israel's General Security Services has been following activities by Iran and its proxy, Hezbollah, in the West Bank and Israel. The security service says Tanzim cells controlled by Iran have been responsible for 21 attacks in which 50 Israelis have been killed and 216 injured.

Following the death of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, Iranian and Hezbollah activities have intensified, and it is believed the two have penetrated cells in the northern West Bank and in Bethlehem.

According to intelligence estimates, Iran and Hezbollah will focus their efforts on undermining any chance of renewing the peace process, and if a ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinians is achieved, they will seek to destroy it.

Reports of the possibility of renewed negotiations between Syria and Israel have also led Iran to prepare its own diplomatic initiative in Damascus to get clarifications from its occasional ally.

Iran is opposed to negotiations between Israel and Syria and the possibility that an interim agreement may result in Hezbollah's withdrawal from Lebanon's southern border with Israel.

Iran and Hezbollah are also focusing attention on intelligence gathering. Among equipment confiscated from one of the group's operatives was a cellular telephone equipped with a Global Positioning System device that pinpoints the position of structures and locations for targeting. The device was delivered in Damascus to Haldoun Ruhi Barghouti of the northern West Bank village of Kubar.

Hezbollah agents worked with partial success on the development of a "bomber kite" capable of carrying several kilograms of explosives with which they planned to target a Gaza Strip settlement. The testing of the kite was halted when a number of cell members were arrested.

Intelligence information also suggests that Iran is giving millions of dollars to Palestinians via Hezbollah contacts. Iran, in effect, has become a replacement for former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, who subsidized families of Palestinian suicide bombers or those injured in the fighting.

In the territories, the funding is being managed by various Islamic welfare organizations. Three brothers belonging to the Abdu family in Nablus were arrested for their role as money handlers on behalf of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards and Hezbollah.

The local organization with which Iran has the closest affiliation is Islamic Jihad, while Hamas maintains a permanent representative in Iran. The broader Hamas group wants to retain a degree of independence with Iran, but accepts financial and technical assistance from Tehran and its agents.

Hezbollah, meanwhile, is focusing its efforts on the Tanzim. Several of the West Bank group's operatives have visited Lebanon and participated in training exercises there.

The Lebanese Shi'ite organization is also trying to foster ties with Israeli Arabs, primarily via contacts abroad.

European Jewish history nearing end: ex-chief rabbi

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Former chief rabbi Meir Lau said last week that European Jewish history is nearing its end and called on the government and the Jewish Agency to prepare for the absorption of Europe's Jews in Israel.

There has been a rise in anti-Semitism in nearly every European country that is being expressed, among other ways, through extreme anti-Israel sentiments, Rabbi Lau warned in a statement.

He quoted data released this past week in Germany showing that 62 per cent of Germans are tired of hearing about the Holocaust and that 70 per cent are angered when reminded of Nazi crimes.

Rabbi Lau, a Holocaust survivor, said he does not see a future for the Jewish community in Europe.

"I see the end of the Diaspora of Jews in Europe," Rabbi Lau said.

"I call on the government to prepare for a new phase in the spiritual and physical absorption of European Jewry before they consider emigrating to the United States or Australia."

According to demographic estimates, there are slightly more than one million Jews living in Europe.

Montrealer made aliyah with a group of 11

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — On Aug. 26, 2003, a group of 11 young professionals from Montreal arrived at Ben Gurion Airport as part of a group aliyah (garin) project facilitated by the Jewish Agency and the Magshimim Foundation in Montreal.

The 11 singles, all in their 20s, decided the previous June to immigrate as a group following an eight-day pilot trip in March, when group members checked out different integration options and decided to settle in subsidized flats in Be'er Sheva, where each took an ulpan and volunteered for the local community as part of the group's self-designed, six-month absorption program.

Among them was one young man by the name of Franck Azoulay, the motivating force behind the project.

Franck Azoulay

The 27-year-old is currently volunteering for the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) for which he is serving in a search and rescue squad. "One of my aspirations in coming to Israel was to make aliyah and one of them was to do the army," says Azoulay, who is currently about a third of the way through his initial three-month service, which will culminate in a period of service each year. "Joining the army is helping me to integrate into Israeli society. It is helping me understand what all Israelis go through. It's another stone with which I am building my new life in Israel."

Azoulay is the first to admit, however, that Israel wasn't always a part of his future plans. "Like most other Jews that grow up in Canada or the States, I didn't have any actual experience with Israel and my ties to the country were not so strong," recalls Azoulay, who went to public school in Montreal before attending the private Jewish high school, Maimonides, completing CGEP and going to the University of Montreal, where he studied international business. "My relationship with Israel basically boiled down to what I saw on the news."

> 'Israel was a great experience. But ... 10 days wasn't enough'

Then in February 2000 Azoulay went on a 10-day tour of the country with Birthright Israel. "That first trip hit me," he says. "It was fun. Israel was a great experience. But it was only 10 days and 10 days wasn't enough."

After his initial trip to Israel, Azoulay returned 13 times, mostly in the capacity of trip leader for subsequent Birthright Israel tours organized through the Bronfman Israel Experience Center at the FEDERATION CJA.

It was also in that professional capacity that Azoulay organized the garin. "Finally, I decided to make my life in Israel," he says with enthusiasm. "I decided that I wanted to make my family in Israel – I wanted to speak Hebrew; I wanted to come home."

That's not to say that actually coming here hasn't been a challenge. To begin with, leaving his family behind has been very hard on both him and them. "It's very hard, especially for my mom," he says. "My ultimate dream is that my parents will follow me here."

Leaving Canada behind also wasn't easy. "I think Canada is one of the best places to live," he says.

"It's a nice example of a country at peace – a fully democratic society where you can live a good life.

"I have also found that the reality in Israel is very different [than I expected]," he adds. "Number one is integration. It's a whole other world and you have to be patient."

But, as Azoulay says, there have been ups to offset the downs. One such "up" happened this year, on Sept. 5, when he married one of his fellow garin members from Montreal.

Azoulay was also fortunate to find work with Canada Israel Experience, where he serves as a guide for visiting groups to Israel from Canada. "When I'm touring with groups, it's not just another job to me. It's important for me to know that these kids leave Israel having had a good experience. It could mean the beginning of their relationship with Israel," says Azoulay, who currently lives in the Jerusalem suburb of Ma'aleh Adumim and volunteers for the Jerusalem Border Police once a week.

"We can't change Israel overnight – we're too small. But we can all make Israel a better place for Jews to live," he says.

"Wherever you stand as a Jew, you need to support Israel, with no boundaries."

Mubarak boosts Sharon

Egypt's president said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon can bring peace with the Palestinians. If the Palestinians "cannot achieve progress during the term of the current prime minister, it will be very difficult to make any progress in peace. He is capable of pursuing peace and of reaching solutions, if he wants to," Hosni Mubarak told reporters in Port Said. Mubarak, who has offered to help keep order in the Gaza Strip after Israel withdraws next year as planned, praised Sharon. "Israel's prime minister said he was ready to do what the Palestinians want, to facilitate the elections [on Jan. 9 to replace deceased PA president Yasser Arafat], and help in removing the checkpoints in the West Bank and Gaza," Mubarak said. "He only asks for one thing: the end of terror."

Israel, Tunisia meeting

Tunisian Foreign Minister Abdel Baki Hermassi met last week in the Hague with Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom. Hermassi told Shalom that Tunisia will continue to assist and strengthen every peace effort between Israel and the Palestinians. The meeting took place in the framework of the mid-term ministerial meeting of the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership. Hermassi also told Shalom that Jews have always been well-received in Tunisia, and that he looks forward to a strengthening of ties between the two states.

PMs at March of the Living

The Israeli and Polish prime ministers will lead a march to mark the 60th anniversary of the liberation of concentration camps. Some 18,000 people are expected to take part May 5 at the site of the former Auschwitz death camp. The march is being organized by March of the Living, which has sponsored programs in Poland since 1988.

British ignorance of Shoah

Ha'aretz carried a report that nearly half of Britons have never heard of the Auschwitz death camp. The results of a survey conducted by the BBC were released last week as Britain's public broadcaster announced it will show a new series in January to mark the 60th anniversary of the death camp's liberation.

Barghouti back in race

Jailed Palestinian Tanzim militia leader Marwan Barghouti changed his mind and has decided to run for the Palestinian Authority presidency. Representatives for Barghouti, who is serving five life prison terms in Israel for orchestrating terror attacks, filed papers last week for the Jan. 9 vote. The move came days after fellow Fatah faction members dissuaded Barghouti from running out of concern he would hurt the prospects of frontrunner Mahmoud Abbas.

A further notice will be directed to residents of Quebec.

PURPOSE OF THIS NOTICE

In 1998, a class action lawsuit was initiated in Ontario against Servier Canada Inc. and various other corporate defendants and on September 13, 2000, the proceeding was certified as a class action on behalf of the following individuals ("Class Members"):

All persons including, but not limited to, executors, administrators, personal representatives, spouses and relatives who on account of a relationship to those persons described in the above defined class, have a derivative claim for damages resulting from the treatment with Ponderal and/or Redux.

COURT APPROVAL OF THE SETTLEMENT AGREEMENT

In September, 2004, an agreement to settle the lawsuit ("the Settlement Agreement") was reached between the parties. That agreement required the approval of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice and, following publication of a notice programme, a hearing was held on October 18 and 19, 2004. The Ontario Superior Court of Justice has now approved the Settlement Agreement by Order dated October 19, 2004.

TERMS OF THE SETTLEMENT

- Servier Canada Inc., while not admitting any liability, will pay benefits to eligible Claimants;
- A Settlement Fund will be established in the amount of $25,000,000.00 to settle the claims of all eligible Product Recipients, Representative Claimants and Derivative Claimants;
- In the event that the sum of $25,000,000.00 is insufficient to compensate all eligible Claimants, a further amount of up to $15,000,000.00, payable in increments as required, will be made available ("the Additional Settlement Funds"), therefore the maximum amount available will be $40,000,000.00;

  - usage of Pondimin in addition to Ponderal and/or Redux;
- Any arguments based on statutes of limitation, prescription or repose shall be waived for Class Members participating in the Settlement;
- Claims may be submitted up to fifteen (15) months following Final Approval of the Settlement Agreement ("Claim Period");
- Claims will be processed during a five (5) year Administration Period, during which time, Claimants may submit additional claims if their condition worsens;
- Provincial and Territorial Health Insurers, with the exception of Quebec, will divide a fund for payment of medical services provided to Product Recipients. In addition, if the Settlement Fund is not fully exhausted by the payment of benefits to all eligible Claimants and court-approved legal fees and costs, the remainder of the Settlement Fund will revert to the Provincial and Territorial Health Insurers, with the exception of Quebec, and to Servier Canada Inc. on a sliding scale.

LEGAL COSTS & FEES

This action has been vigorously contested and has involved a number of motions and appeals, over fifty days of discovery conducted primarily in France and the review and analysis of over 300,000 documents. Class Counsel have funded the time and expenses incurred in pursuing the litigation; however, to date, Class Counsel have received approximately $700,000, inclusive of GST and disbursements, in court-awarded partial indemnity costs paid by Servier Canada Inc. The Settlement Agreement provides for further payment by Servier Canada Inc. to Class Counsel of $3,000,000 for partial indemnity costs and $1,000,000 towards their disbursements; both of these amounts are inclusive of applicable taxes.

In addition, Class Counsel applied on November 1 and 2, 2004 for Court approval of further fees which shall be paid from the settlement funds. The decision of the Ontario Superior Court on this application is pending. Claimants may retain their own lawyers to assist them in making individual claims to the Settlement. Claimants are responsible for paying the legal fees of any lawyer they retain.

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS —France has vowed action against Hezbollah's Al-Manar television station, saying it would shortly seek fresh powers from parliament to suspend stations that incite hatred or air racist comments.

Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin announced the decision after meeting Dominique Baudis, whose CSA broadcasting authority appealed last week to France's highest administrative court to allow it to shut down Al-Manar's satellite broadcasts from France to the rest of the European Union.

The broadcaster comes under French jurisdiction because it uses the French-based Eutelsat.

In a statement, the CSA said broadcasts by Lebanon-based Al-Manar, the mouthpiece of the Hezbollah guerrilla group, were a threat to public order and in breach of its agreement not to incite hatred among religions. The group signed the deal on Nov. 19 in order to renew its broadcast license.

The CSA decision to grant Al-Manar another license shocked Jewish organizations who felt they had received a specific guarantee from the government that new legislation would prevent the channel from being re-licensed.

When the CSA signed the agreement with Al-Manar, Jewish groups believed the CSA had been forced to capitulate because of the state's close diplomatic ties with the Arab world.

The CSA's appeal to the court came after it watched a tape of a Nov. 23 Al-Manar news broadcast that accused "Zionists" of "transmitting dangerous diseases such as AIDS through exports to Arab countries."

The court ruled the CSA could only ban Al-Manar if the station refused to apply for authorization, a decision criticized by Jewish groups.

Opposition parties have also been pressuring the government on Al-Manar. In a Nov. 27 letter to the CSA the previous Saturday Socialist Party leader Francois Hollande said that "the non-stop transmission of clips inciting children toward hatred and martyrdom" is "incompatible with the values of the European Union."

The government now says it will ask parliament to approve tougher laws allowing the immediate suspension of channels "undermining public order, notably by broadcasting images that incite hatred or racist comments," Raffarin's office said in a statement.

Action was needed because of the "legitimate emotion and the trouble caused by the broadcasting of unacceptable programs by Al-Manar," it added.

The CSA re-approved Al-Manar last month despite a vigorous campaign by local and international Jewish groups, charging that it's violently anti-Semitic and has broadcast a number of offensive shows since it was first licensed.

Al-Manar is one of several Arabic-language satellite stations popular among France's five million Muslims, mostly of North African origin. Paris has expressed concern about growing Islamist influence among disaffected Muslim youths.

Al-Manar said it had respected a pledge to unbiased reporting that staved off an earlier ban, and urged the CSA not to bend to pressure to block its broadcasts.

The CSA took Al-Manar to court last August after its Syrian-made drama The Diaspora, which depicts a Zionist plot to dominate the world, provoked uproar when it was shown during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan in 2003.

Based on the notorious czarist-era forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the series depicted Jews planning world domination and presented violent scenes in which a Christian child is murdered on a rabbi's orders so his blood can be used to make matzot.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

What do you get when you throw a popular shtetl folktale into a pot along with a pinch of Chanukah seasoning, some flavourful music for full orchestra and klezmer band, and live narration by Barbara Budd, the Toronto-based co-host of the popular CBC radio show As It Happens?

The answer is Bone Button Borscht, a tasty holiday entertainment for the whole family, creatively assembled by Budd and due to be performed next week in Toronto.

The main ingredient of Bone Button Borscht is the children's story of the same name by Toronto author Aubrey Davis, published about a decade ago by Kids Can Press of Toronto.

Set in an Eastern European shtetl, the tale tells the popular legend of a beggar who arrives in a poor village, claiming he can make a delicious soup using only the buttons of his coat – if only he had one more button. But no one at first will help him with the soup.

"Gradually, everyone realizes they have something they can offer the stranger, and that if they do reach out their hands in generosity and sharing, then everyone profits," Budd recounted. "By sharing, they learn that sometimes the miracle is within every single person."

Eight years ago, on the first night of Chanukah, Budd read Davis's story without music on As It Happens. The story generated such a huge response from the show's international audience that she retold it the following year.

"People wrote in from Finland and Korea and from all over the United States and Canada, asking, 'When will that story about Chanukah be on again?' It's so funny because it's really not a Chanukah story, people just associate it with the holiday season. It really speaks to the whole story of Chanukah and Christmas, which is about the belief in miracles and the spirit of community."

Inspired to set the story to music, she spent four or five years searching for suitable classical accompaniment, and finally discovered Suite for Klezmer Band and Orchestra, by Winnipeg composer Sid Robinovitch.

"When I heard it, it was like a 'Eureka!' moment for me," said Budd. She attained Robinovitch's permission to rearrange the composition, pulling it apart and "quilting it back together" to suit the story.

Bone Button Borscht was warmly received when it premiered last December with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra at Roy Thomson Hall. Now Budd is readying to perform it again on Dec. 16 with the Toronto Philharmonic Orchestra and the local klezmer band Beyond the Pale.

Performances are also scheduled in Winnipeg with the Winnipeg Symphony on Dec 23 and in Kitchener with the Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony on Jan. 20, 2005. A bilingual performance with the Montreal Symphony is slated for Montreal on March 20, 2005.

Budd grew up studying music in St. Catharines; she played the violin. After studying theatre at York University, she acted for five seasons with the Stratford Festival, then joined As It Happens.

The experience of creatively assembling the words and music of Bone Button Borscht into an artistic whole has been immensely satisfying for her, she said. "I was raised an Irish Catholic, and I learned a wonderful Yiddish word," she said. "The word is 'bashert.' It means they were meant to go together. It's a lovely word."

Bone Button Borscht is being performed at the George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St., on Thursday Dec. 16, 8 p.m. as part of Sounds of the Season, an evening of music with the Toronto Philharmonia Orchestra. For tickets, contact the box office at 416-733-9388 or TicketMaster at 416-870-8000. A CD of Bone Button Borscht is also available.

Chamber Orchestra to premiere Archimedes' Codex

The Via Salzburg Chamber Orchestra, under artistic director and violinist Mayumi Seiler, celebrates the holiday season with a journey from Baroque to contemporary, and the world premiere of Archimedes' Codex by Michael Oesterle.

The programme also includes Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major, Britten's Simple Symphony, Bach's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in E Major and Vivaldi's Concerto for Four Violins.

For his new work, composer Oesterle was inspired by Greek mathematician Archimedes' collection of works (codex) which explored the simple but perplexing forms of geometry, and the physics of mass and energy at its most elemental. Archimedes' Codex was commissioned by Via Salzburg with financial assistance by the Conseil des arts et des lettres du Québec (CALQ).

The performances are at the Glen Gould Studio, Canadian Broadcasting Centre, 250 Front St. W., Toronto. Dec. 9 and Dec. 10 , 8 p.m. Tickets $43 ($38 seniors, $29 students). Call 416-205-5555.

Jacques Israelievitch headlines Orchestra Toronto concert

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Orchestra Toronto, one of Canada's premier full-sized community volunteer symphony orchestras, will feature violin soloist and Toronto Symphony Orchestra concertmaster Jacques Israelievitch at the second concert of its 50th anniversary season.

The event, titled "Viennese Holiday," will be held Dec. 12 at the George Weston Recital Hall in the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Violinist Jacques Israelievitch

Israelievitch, who was born in Cannes, France, has made many solo appearances. He plays, teaches and conducts regularly in the United States, Europe and the Far East.

In 2002, he received one of France's highest honours when he was made a Chevalier des Arts et Lettres.

The members of Orchestra Toronto "are a talented group of people. They have professional standards and they are striving to receive the best results possible," Israelievitch said.

"There are no paid players except for some principal players. They mostly have other professions where they make a living."

Israelievitch describes the orchestra as "a very enthusiastic and dedicated group, and I look forward to playing with them."

He also noted that Orchestra Toronto performs a complete range of music.

The Dec. 12 concert will include traditional Viennese light favourites, along with Beethoven's Violin Concerto performed by Israelievitch. It will also include works by Mozart, Johann Strauss Jr., Kreisler, Lehar and Rudolph Sieczynski.

The symphony was founded in 1954 as the Bennington Heights Community Orchestra. Ten years later, under music director, Milton Barnes, the former conductor of the St. Catharines Symphony Orchestra, it changed its name to the East York Community Orchestra.

By the mid-1970s, the orchestra had 63 players of varying ages and an expanding repertoire.

In 1998, when the borough of East York was amalgamated into the new City of Toronto, the symphony adopted its current name. Its more than 95 players pay a membership fee to rehearse and perform.

Errol Gay, who was appointed artistic director and conductor in 2002, is well known in Toronto music circles and is familiar to younger patrons as conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra's children's concerts.

From 1970 to 1976, Gay was conductor and choirmaster with the Canadian Opera Company and a guest conductor with leading Canadian orchestras.

Israelievitch called Gay "an old friend and colleague," adding, "we have worked closely at the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. This [Orchestra Toronto collaboration] is an added dimension of our friendship."

The Dec. 12 concert will also feature tenor Kurt Lehmann.

"[Lehmann's] growing reputation is evidenced by his beautiful and lyrical voice that has been thrilling audiences in a wide range of characters in operas and with orchestras across Canada and in the United States," Gay said.

The orchestra's 2004/05 artist-in-residence, violinist Catherine Manoukian, will give a free pre-concert talk at 2 p.m.

Dorothy Shoichet, a member of Orchestra Toronto's board, said the symphony's mission is to introduce young families to good music. "We want to get them early enough to appreciate the music."

Its Sunday afternoon concerts are "family destinations where generations can meet together for of music, fun, education and themed concerts" and "the seats are very reasonable," Shoichet said.

Tickets are $30 for adults, $25 for seniors and students and $10 for children and youth up to 18. For more information or to order tickets, call 416-467-7142, e-mail otoronto@on.aibn.com or visit www.orchestratoronto.ca.

Retiree tries to elicit smiles with his paintings

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Retired Toronto architect Franklyn Glazier is presenting an exhibition of his nostalgic and whimsical paintings of landscapes, urban scenes and people at the Coop Gallery, at 112 Scollard St. in Yorkville, to Dec. 30.

Glazier, 70, creates lighthearted yet realistic watercolour and acrylic paintings, some with Jewish themes.

In his current exhibition, Glazier has included Shacharit... with attitude, a depiction of morning prayer; Hangin' Out, a scene in Little Italy; Racing the Rain, a boat scene; and You're Late, showing a lady admonishing her friend for being late.

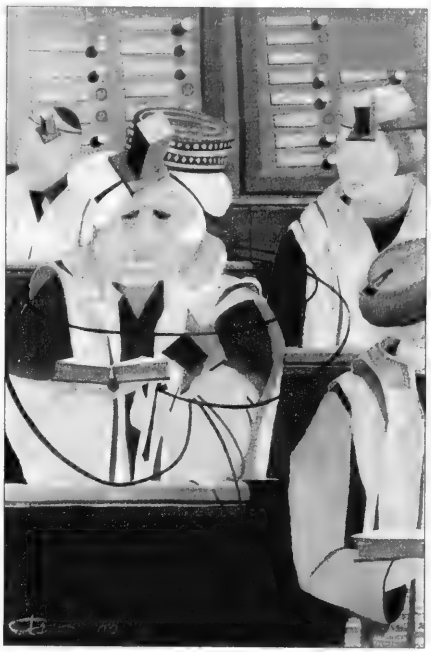
Glazier was born in Toronto, attended Forest Hill Collegiate and graduated from the University of Toronto's school of architecture in 1957. He retired six years ago.

Although he has been interested in painting since childhood, his schooling and a busy career forced him to put his painting on hold. "And now I have time to paint."

Glazier had his first solo exhibition of watercolour paintings of street scenes and landscapes at the Civic Garden Centre at Edwards Gardens in 2001, and another at the same location the following year.

He has also exhibited at the Ingram Gallery, Holy Blossom Temple and the Painted City Gallery.

If a painting makes him smile and gets the same reaction from a viewer, "then it is successful," Glazier says.



Shacharit... with attitude

"I hope to continue painting because I find it is immensely satisfying. And also, it gives me the ability to do what I want – feeling responsible only to myself."

For more information, call 416-963-3131 or visit www.cooponscollard.com for exhibit hours or to make an appointment.

CANADIAN FILM COMPANY OPTIONS RIGHTS TO MOSES LAPINSKY

A Canadian and television film production company has optioned the rights to Karen X. Tulchinsky's critically acclaimed novel The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, the book's Vancouver-based publisher, Raincoast Books, recently announced.

Ocular Productions of Winnipeg has also hired Tulchinsky as principal scriptwriter for the project.

Published in 2003, The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky colourfully depicts the remarkable fortunes of boxing champion Sonny Lapinsky and his ebullient Russian-Jewish immigrant family in Toronto during the 1930s and '40s.

The book, which was nominated for a City of Toronto Arts Award, offers one of the most sustained and thorough depictions in fiction of Toronto's historic Jewish community from that era. It was reissued recently in trade paperback format.

In a sense, the book stands as Toronto's answer to Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, which chronicled the Montreal Jewish community in a similar way, and which ultimately was translated into a highly successful film starring Richard Dreyfuss.

Let's hope Ocular finds a director and cast talented enough to give Moses Lapinsky the first-rate cinematic treatment it deserves.

The choir performs this and many other compositions in Carols and Lullabies! $32 to $42. New Twist on Old Formula: Toronto author Elyse Friedman, who made her debut a few years ago with the novel Then and Again, has produced a new novel, Waking Beauty, which was published recently by Random House.

The story focuses on 22-year-old Allison Penny, the first-person narrator who presents herself as fat, depressed and ugly. That's in the "Before" section of the book. In the "After" section, she magically awakens as a slim and gorgeous goddess who is deeply coveted by men and modeling agencies. Wherever she turns, doors open and offers pour in. Her external transformation transforms her life.

The moral of Friedman's ironic tale is emblazoned on the cover – "It's what's on the outside that counts" – and affirms her contention that surface beauty is everything, inner beauty nothing.

"What I wanted to do was just hold a mirror up to the world," she told Eye on Arts. "Even though we like to think that it's what's inside that counts, which is always the moral in this type of story, that's not what I wanted to do. I wanted to show what would happen in reality if an ugly woman suddenly wakes up beautiful – which is that her life would improve measurably in almost every area."

Friedman acknowledged that Waking Beauty has been marketed as a sort of fairy tale but said she prefers to categorize it as a "high-concept tale."

Like many modern popular feminist romances, it is couched in explicit sexual imagery and vernacular language. Still, she said she has no qualms about reading passages in public, as she did a while back at a local Indigo bookstore.

"In Indigo I toned it down a little bit, but if I'm reading in a pub I don't think I'd be too worried about it," she said.

Waking Beauty is published under Random House's Three Rivers imprint. It sells for $19.95.

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

My first exposure to the Holocaust came from a small book that I received as a present for my 11th birthday.

I am sure the same is true for many other children worldwide – Jewish or otherwise. The Diary of Anne Frank, arguably more than any other book, has the power to make the unfathomable mass genocide understandable through the story of one little girl.

As writer Primo Levi said: "One single Anne Frank moves us more than the countless others who suffered just as she did, but whose faces have remained in the shadows. Perhaps it is better that way; if we were capable of taking in all the suffering of all those people, we would not be able to live."

In 1960, the Anne Frank House was opened as a museum, and over the years, millions have travelled to 263 Prinsengracht in Amsterdam to see where it all happened.

To coincide with the 75th anniversary of Anne's birth, and the 60th anniversary or her last diary entry, Overlook Press has released Inside Anne Frank's House: An Illustrated Journey Through Anne's World.

Chapter by chapter, the book takes readers through each room in the Anne Frank House. It also contains pictures and descriptions of display objects and relevant quotations from Anne's diary, all supplemented by background information.

Also included are colour photographs of a temporary refurnishing of both the front part of the house and its secret annex, where Anne hid with her family.

The book also deals with the tragic events that followed Anne's last entry and the capture of the people hiding with her. As well, it includes witness testimonies from people who were in the camps with the Franks, and historical documents and photos.

The last chapter focuses on how the diary was found and published, as well as on subsequent plays and movies, and the creation of the museum.

All in all, for those who have been to the museum, and those who haven't, this book is a wonderful, visual addition to the original diaries.

Research has shown that four-year-old children smile and laugh approximately 400 times per day. Why is it that in adults, smiles and laughter decrease to only 14 times per day?

A smile is engaging. It has an energy that draws people to it like a magnetic force. A smiling face can make you forget that it is cold and dreary outside, and it provides comfort and reassurance. A smile can magically turn an unpleasant face into one that radiates beauty.

A smile doesn't cost anything, yet it gives so much. Most of us smile at our friends, our children and our loved ones. But how about smiling at the grocery check-out clerk and the senior citizen we pass in the street? Why do we pretend not to see our acquaintances when we happen to meet them during our daily activities? Are we so busy that we don't have time to smile or say hello to the person we were just talking to at the doctor's office, or the night before at the PTA meeting? True, that person may be only a casual acquaintance, but we are always careful to ensure that we greet our business acquaintances, and we don't hesitate to say hello to someone when we need something from them or when we aspire to be part of their circle of influence.

I guess my undergraduate background in sociology makes me ponder these things sometimes, and it also pushes me to conduct the occasional experiment.

While jogging outside in my neighbourhood, I decided to smile at another female jogger. I did not know her, but I kept passing her as we did our workout in the park. Sadly, she pretended not to notice, and each time we passed each other, she would look the other way.

I also smiled at the senior citizen who seemed lonely as she was determinedly walking through the park, slowly but surely ensuring that she got her fresh air and exercise for the day. When I smiled at her, she seemed taken aback at being acknowledged, when she was so used to being unnoticed. The next time I passed her, she looked at me with a tentative expression in her eyes, waiting to see if I actually did smile at her and if I would do so again, and, of course, I did. Her reaction, although no words were spoken, was to give me a radiant smile in return, one that reflected appreciation and gratitude for my acknowledgement of her existence. It was a gift that I gave her, and it meant so much.

I am not sure what happens to us between childhood and adulthood. I know that my eight-year-old son still calls out to any casual acquaintance he may see, calling after the other child until his greeting is finally acknowledged. As we become serious, hard-working and very busy adults, do we lose our sense of humour and friendliness, along with our freedom to smile and laugh? Such a loss is truly unfortunate.

To go back to the research, not only does our smile have a positive impact on others, but research shows that a gentle smile relaxes our facial muscles and sends a message to our brain that things are OK. Even if we don't think we have much to smile about, by forcing ourselves to smile, we fool ourselves into feeling better. As our mood improves, we open ourselves to new possibilities, and people begin to respond to us more favourably.

I would like to remind everyone that the Torah implores us to greet others with kindness. According to the great talmudic sage, Shammai, we must "receive all men with a kind countenance." Shammai was known for his excellence in this trait and can be kept in mind as our role model in this regard.

So, be sure to smile today. Smile on purpose, even if you don't feel like it. If not for others, then do it for yourself. You may be pleasantly surprised by the results!

York election results worry Jewish students

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Hillel students at York University are worried that the lopsided results of recent student elections will create even more friction on an already polarized campus.

The Unity slate took 15 out of the 19 available seats on the York Federation of Students (YFS), including all three executive positions. One of those positions, vice-president of finance, was won by Rabia Siddiqui, a spokesperson for the campus group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR).

The incumbent Progress Not Politics (PNP) slate – which went into the vote with 27 of 32 seats on a larger YFS council – won only four seats. Paul Cooper, outgoing YFS president and leader of the original PNP slate, is the former head of York's Young Zionist Partnership.

In a pre-election edition of Excalibur, the main campus newspaper, Unity candidates called for "reinvigorated activism" and "empowering students who may feel isolated and disenfranchised." The PNP campaign focused on enhancing student services and on issues related to campus life.

"The atmosphere on campus has definitely taken a turn for the worse," said Jordie Saperia, a fourth year political science student and former Hillel president.

The past few weeks at York have seen a heated rally sponsored by CUPE 3903, the union that represents York contract faculty and teaching assistants, as well as a SPHR event where a York professor handed out literature titled "The York University Foundation: the Tail that Wags the Dog."

It contained a list of some foundation board members and their links to Jewish groups, and said the foundation, York's fundraising arm, is "biased by the presence and influence of staunch pro-Israel lobbyists, activities and fundraising agencies."

"This is just part and parcel of what Jewish students experience explicitly and implicitly on campus everyday," Saperia said.

"Students find themselves listening to professors putting forward anti-Israeli views based on rich/poor arguments where the Israelis are viewed as the rich and the Palestinians are the poor."

In addition, he said, pro-Israel advocates are faced with teaching assistants and other students who appear at free speech rallies in support of anti-Israel speakers.

Saperia said the same students also support or belong to groups such as Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), who have put out press releases that welcome Concordia University's decision not to invite former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak to speak on campus.

> 'Atmosphere on campus has definitely taken a turn for the worse'

"They're clearly only in favour of certain types of free speech," he said.

"I may not like certain views, like Norman Finkelstein and Noam Chomsky, but I don't ask the university to prevent them from appearing on campus," he added, referring to two prominent academic critics of Israel who have spoken at York in the last two years.

Hillel students are concerned that with the Unity slate holding three-quarters of the seats, it will have the power to modify bylaws and undo many of the changes implemented by PNP since winning control of council last year from a left-of-centre YFS executive.

For example, the YFS may now attempt to revise the definitions of certain campus services and clubs. Before PNP was elected, clubs such as Hillel were getting approximately $300 a year from YFS. On the other hand, services that assist the disabled, such as Able York, and the Women's Centre, which offers aid for rape and abuse victims, were given base funding of $10,000, said Talia Klein, director of Hillel@York.

At that time, "some clubs like the York University Black Students Association, TBL Gay, and the Aboriginal Group had their status changed to services, because YFS was controlled by students sympathetic to those groups," Klein said.

Unfortunately, she added, these clubs have tended to join together with SPHR, which consistently organizes anti-Israel programs on campus.

Over the past year, PNP has worked hard to create a more equitable distribution of funds between clubs and services, said Dori Borshiov, the current president of Hillel@York and a fourth-year economics and political science student.

"There should be no difference between the Black Students' Association and the Chinese Students' Association," Borshiov said.

Borshiov, who ran unsuccessfully for student council under the PNP banner, is very disappointed with the results.

Online voting had a real impact on the election results. "People brought their computers and pressed their friends to vote," Borshiov said.

"We'll have to regroup and think about how to improve our campaign for next March's elections."

Siddiqui, the YFS vice-president-elect, said student government "isn't meant as an avenue to put forward personal politics. Clubs are meant to deal with those issues."

She added that one of the factors that will affect funding "will depend on those clubs that are most actively involved in the community."

Rabbi draws parallel between Jews and America

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Any nation that has sought to spread democracy has suffered the same fate as the Jews, says Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, an author and nationally syndicated radio host.

"Jews are hated because they've always had morals, and [there is a] parallel between Jews and moral America. They are both accused of wanting to take over the world," he said at a recent lecture at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Americans, like Jews before them, have learned to be the most hated nation on earth, he said. "[We know about] boys who have been told to take off their yarmulkes, but we would never believe that Americans would be told not to wave their flag in Europe."

Rabbi Boteach, who was in Toronto to promote his new book, Face Your Fear, Living with Courage in an Age of Caution, said that both U.S. President George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon have been compared to Hitler, and the Israelis have been compared to Nazis.

"Sixty years ago, an evil stalked the earth, and he was evil because he was so rational. Hitler's evil was always portrayed in a logical way. He sought to undo Jewish morality.

"The world has learned nothing, because 60 years after a silent world watched while we were being gassed and orphaned, [tyrants slaughter innocent people] and it says nothing."

The world is not moral, he said, referring to Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat. "Murderers die a peaceful death in exile, and the liberators die horrible deaths."

The rabbi said that he is not a politician. "I am simply a Jew, and we are all God's children. A Jewish life is not more precious than an Arab life, and I will not be silent while Arabs are being murdered. It's a moral issue. We can't allow a dictator to kill a baby without being accountable for it."

"We dare not be silent in the face of genocide. How vocal were Jews about Sudan or Rwanda? "

If a Jew cannot raise his voice against genocide, he said, "than the words 'Never again' are hollow. The Holocaust museums [would be nothing more] than bricks and mortar."

Bar mitzvah boy donates cash to Israel hockey

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As gestures go, it was a pretty generous one.

In a made-for-the media event at the Rinx recreational centre in Toronto, 13-year-old Alex Boyman donated the cash haul from his bar mitzvah to Israel's junior hockey program.

Dressed in a white and blue Israeli hockey sweater, Boyman presented a cheque for $6,000 to Moshe Eizenman, the representative of Israeli hockey's junior program in Toronto, and Gerry Halbert, a past president of UIA Federations Canada, the community organization that funnels Canadian-raised funds to Israel.

Money will help bring kids to rink in Canada Centre

The money will go to support the transportation program that buses Israeli youth living in small communities to the Canada Centre in Metulla to play hockey.

Boyman, who had his bar mitzvah in Herzliyah Pituach last March, said he wanted to help Israeli kids enjoy the game the way he does. "It's a passion for sport, helping kids who have a passion for sport," he said.

Boyman, who plays centre/forward for three different Toronto teams, visited Metulla during his bar mitzvah trip and played with the Israeli junior team. "It was an amazing experience to skate with the team, to be in the dressing room," he said. "Some of them are really good."

Eizenman said Boyman's donation will go a long way to making the hockey program in Metulla viable.

Canada Centre attracts youngsters from kibbutzim, moshavim and small towns around Metulla in Israel's north. But lack of transportation prevents many from participating and so Canada Centre has implemented a busing program to bring youngsters to the rink.

The program has succeeded in doubling the number of kids playing hockey this year, Eizenman said. Prior to September, Canada Centre hosted about 50 youngsters in its hockey program. Since then, the program has doubled to about 100 kids ranging in age from 13 to 17.

Canadians provide $25,000 US to the hockey program each year to make sure it can succeed. An additional $25,000 US goes to support the centre's speed skating and figure skating programs, which involve dozens of young athletes, said Halbert.

Canadians will have the chance to view the Israelis first hand this winter. The national junior team will visit Toronto from Feb. 21 to 23 following a trip to Los Angeles. While in southern California, they will face the Mexican national junior team in an exhibition game at the Staples Center, and in Toronto, they will skate in a mini-training camp under the supervision of head coach Jean Perron, who led the Montreal Canadiens to a Stanley Cup victory in 1986. Eizenman has recruited seven Israeli AAA-level players for an evaluation at the training camp.

Perron will coach the Israelis in exhibition games in Toronto and he will meet the team in Sofia, Bulgaria, for an IIHF (International Ice Hockey Federation) Division 3 qualifier in March.

Alex Boyman presents a cheque for $6,000 to Moshe Eizenman, the representative of Israeli hockey in Toronto.

Oldest Jewish ballplayer dies

CJN news services

NEW YORK — Harry Danning, who was the oldest living Jewish major league baseball player, died recently in Indiana at age 93.

Danning was an all-star catcher for the New York Giants from 1933 to 1942. Nicknamed "Harry the Horse," he was a lifetime .285 hitter who once hit for the cycle (a single, double, triple and home run in one game). He was also on the all star team every year between 1938 and 1941.

Danning told JTA earlier this year that he didn't face a lot of anti-Semitism when he played. There were "bench jockeys" who needled him about his large nose – "Pitch under his nose, he can't see the ball," he remembers them saying – but they got on all the players.

Gallery features nostalgic look at Maple Leaf Gardens

Nostalgia buffs with a fond recollection of the glories of Maple Leaf Gardens can get their hockey fix at a unique exhibit that highlights Toronto's own temple of the game.

The Eric Arthur Gallery at the University of Toronto's faculty of architecture, landscape and design is mounting the exhibit featuring "the Carlton Street Cashbox."

Titled, "From Hockey Heaven to Superstore" – referring to a plan to turn the Gardens into a giant Loblaws supermarket – the exhibit provides an unusual in-depth look at the hockey shrine, combining pop-culture memorabilia with architectural drawings of the building's past and future, a U of T news release says.

Included in the display are hockey artifacts, newspaper stories of some of the famous people who appeared at the Gardens over its 68-year history, as well as a sampling of the proposals for the Gardens' post-hockey existence.

Erected in 1931 by Maple Leaf owner Conn Smythe in only 5½ months, the Gardens became home to Toronto's beloved Maple Leafs. The Leafs won a string of Stanley Cup championships in the 1940s and again in the 1960s while playing at the Gardens, cementing the facility's hold on the public imagination.

The downtown building also hosted every major act that came to town, including travelling circuses, Elvis, the Beatles and Bruce Springsteen. Boxing champ Muhammad Ali took on Canadian favourite George Chuvalo at the Gardens in 1966.

New ownership and changing economics spelled the end of the Gardens as a viable hockey arena, and in recent years, various proposals have been advanced for the building following the Leafs' move to the Air Canada Centre. The exhibit features some of the proposed designs, ranging from housing for the homeless, to a condominium development and a multi-faith religious centre. In the end, Loblaws, one of the exhibit sponsors, announced it would redevelop the site as a huge grocery store while preserving the building's art deco exterior. The design features three levels of retail space, a fitness club, cooking school and parking.

A drama queen's quarter-life crisis

Each month as I sit down to write this column and consider that it's about being 20something, a number of frivolous thoughts come to mind. But this time, I don't want to write about dating woes or career crises.

BY SANDIE BENITAH

There's got to be something more real, more profound, that defines this time in our lives.

I could write about my parents' separation, but I'm just not ready to deal with those feelings yet. I could write about all of my insecurities, but I'd rather keep them private.

But if those are the thoughts that are filling my head, how can I write about anything else without feeling like a complete fake?

I can't. But at the same time, I can't be anything but fake at this point in my life, because I'm just beginning to understand how to be true to myself.

It's hard to be honest when you don't fully understand who you are yet, or why you feel the way you do about certain things. I've been forced to question everything I've ever thought about life and about myself. I no longer have concrete thoughts and opinions on everlasting love, on ethics, on values, or on anything, for that matter. Right now, it's as if I'm being reborn, learning things for the second time – only this time without any of my little-girl illusions.

It's easy to make judgments and talk about topics that don't really mean much at the end of the day, like boys or work. But when it comes to talking about all the stuff in between – the feelings and thoughts that bog me down for most of my day – I'm at a loss for words.

It's simple really. There are no words yet to describe these moments because I don't understand them myself.

It's unfortunate, really, because I've always wanted to be the kind of woman who is articulate and thoughtful, somebody who makes complete sense when she opens her mouth. But now, as I open my heart to write down the truth of my experiences, there is nothing I can write that will make sense of this transitional moment in my life.

I must be getting old. Some people speak of going through a mid-life crisis, changing everything in their life to try to regain their youth. Well, here I am, going through a quarter-life crisis, where everything around me is changing and I, too, am desperately trying to hang on to the innocence of my youth.

Ugh! It sounds so dramatic, I'm rolling my eyes. The last thing I want to be is a drama queen. I'm just trying to be honest.

And quite honestly, I'm sick of being so serious. I should have written about how chivalry is dead. That thought also crossed my mind this month.

But the only thing that's worse to me than being a drama queen is being a fake.

I have to be thankful for this confusing, frustrating time, because, as I said before, it's forcing me to question myself and my beliefs. Before, I just lived life and believed things without really questioning why. Now, here I am, full of questions, and not many answers. So, while I may not quite understand myself yet, at least I'm beginning to know myself.

But big deal. Now what?

I started out by saying that there must be something profound about being 20something, and maybe that profundity comes from our search for our real selves, and for self-acceptance.

Maybe, maybe not. I don't know. I'm still searching for answers.

POTATO PARSNIP LATKES

2 large baking potatoes
2 tblsp. lemon juice
4 medium parsnips
4 large eggs, lightly beaten
6 tblsp. finely chopped fresh chives
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1 1/2 cups vegetable oil

Peel potato and coarsely grate into bowl. Add lemon juice and toss to combine. Place potato on towel, then gather up corners to form a sack and twist tightly to wring out as much liquid as possible. In bowl, mix potato with peeled & coarsely grated parsnips, flour, eggs, chives, salt & pepper until combined well.

Heat oil in nonstick skillet over moderate heat until hot but not smoking. Pour 1/4 cup latke mixture into skillet, then flatten into 3" in diameter with slotted spatula. Form 3 more latkes in skillet, then cook until golden, about 1 1/2 mins. on each side. Transfer latkes with spatula to paper towels to drain. Keep warm on rack set in shallow baking pan in oven. Make more latkes in same manner, in batches of 4, with remaining mixture. Makes about 32 latkes.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I've just about had it with my job. I work in an environment where everyone knows what's expected of them. If we all do our jobs well, the place runs like a well-oiled machine.

Yet, I work with one colleague who seems to get away with murder. She is lazy and disloyal. When she can get away with it, she calls in sick or leaves work early. When she is here, she is often on the phone or playing on her computer. If the job gets tougher, as it sometime does, she never puts in that little extra like the rest of us do.

Management seems to turn a blind eye to her antics, possibly because of her seniority, but it is very demoralizing to the rest of us.

Do you think I should just throw in the towel and find a new job or stay and work out these problems. With the exception of this disrespectful woman, I actually like it here.

Annoyed at Work

Dear Annoyed at Work

A working environment is made up of many diverse personalities, often coming together to work under pressure. We all know that people handle pressure differently. In addition, there may be circumstances you are not aware of, such as health, family or financial problems. All these things affect personalities.

Unfortunately, you can't choose your co-workers. That is up to management. What you do know is that you are unhappy. Don't simmer or you will blow. It's time to arrange a meeting with your boss and speak your mind. It's very possible that he or she has no idea, or is willing to live with the problems for reasons you are not privy to.

Don't expect miracles. Chances are your colleague is there to stay. What you can expect is to be heard. Hopefully by bringing it to the attention of your employer and your colleague, it will alleviate the problems, even for a short while.

Anything you enjoy is worth fighting for. Don't give up on a job you like because of one bad apple. Work around her and stay in closer contact with your colleagues that do work as a team.

News flash: editors should read some Torah

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I always take great pleasure in reading about the biblical characters and discovering their very human and balanced ways. How delightful it would be to be a Shabbat guest in the tent of Sarah and Abraham, a very ambitious couple who were renowned for their hospitality. I learned much about love from Isaac and Rebecca, but I'm not sure if I could have been their chaver (friend), as their affection and romance seemed so inwardly directed. I always understood Jacob to be a determined man with loins of passion and fiery faith, but I wonder if he was able to enjoy the sweetness of comradeship and creation.

The Chumash, I believe, generally projects a balanced view of its archetypes, and, I would argue, it gives us an encouraging image of our world and humankind, and its potential to achieve greatness.

Then you read the headlines in your daily newspaper: "Death stalks Bhopal 20 years later"; "Fear replaces tolerance as racism sweeps Holland"; "Doomsday clock keeps ticking"; "High school boys stabbed to death"; "President announces plan to buy weapons from Russia"; "Police kill five in shootouts in bid to quell slum violence".

It's Shabbat, a day of rest, and you have just perused the first section of a Toronto newspaper. Some of the words from the above headlines that might have registered with you include: death, fear, doomsday, stabbed, weapons and kill.

"Decades of war, purges in Ukraine"; "The Dutch are afraid of us"; "Naval war games a serious business"; "Needless delays on child-care plan".

You have now read two more sections and have likely been left with powerful images from words such as: war, purges, afraid, naval, delays.

The editors of this newspaper, an essential archivist of history, seem to believe that the world is principally motivated by bad intentions and covered with a tarp of negativity and gloom. Death, stabbed, kill, fear, under fire – these are not terms that elicit cheer.

But do they – the editors – see the world as it actually is? Or are they missing components of it that might lend a certain reality, fairness and hopefulness to our reading – and, ultimately, to humanity?

I believe this is a question worth addressing, because our relationship to the world is greatly influenced by the news we hear and read. If this is the case, then as we ingest the flavour of stories that describe the bleakness of our world, we become the news – depressed, hopeless, and forgetful of humankind's brilliant creations since "the beginning."

The world, as I see it, is not without its pockmarks and anguish. It is also, however, forever flourishing, budding and emerging with discovery, detection, inventions and wisdom, as well as vast humanity and benevolence.

Maybe we should take a lesson from seniors, who often decide to stop reading newspapers. Their reasoning, as I've been told, is based upon their preference to live life with pleasure and positive expectations, sparing themselves the point of view of an editor who prefers to report on tragedy and suffering. They choose to celebrate the greatness of men and women and the inherent attractiveness in our world.

Wouldn't it be grand if an editor decided to design a newspaper predicated on a more balanced view of humanity, written in a way that inspired its readers to grow with buoyancy and resilience, rather than constantly causing us to cower with dread and trepidation.

In order to do this, it might be prudent for newspaper folk to visit places where courage, integrity and kindness abound… like the tent of Abraham and Sarah.

PERSONALIZED MEDICINE
Treatment as unique as you are.

SORRY, WE CAN'T DO ANYTHING ABOUT HER HAIR.

Mount Sinai has developed the ability to diagnose Crohn's disease earlier and with higher accuracy, which will lead to faster treatment, better care, and just might put us on a path to a cure. This is all thanks to personalized medicine. It's the latest advancement in our ability to deliver The Best Medicine that asks the question: If every patient has their own unique biological, sociological, and psychological make-up, then shouldn't their treatments be just as unique? Mount Sinai's incredible success in researching the human genome, our genetic blue print, has lead to the translation of targeted research into customized treatment for the prevention, detection, and curing of diseases. Helping us to not just understand how diseases work, but how they affect each and every one of us in different ways. And Crohn's disease is just the tip of the iceberg. With similar breakthroughs in the diagnosis of colon cancer, there seems to be no limit to what personalized medicine can do. It may very well be one of the most important medical breakthroughs in recent times, and the key to the future of modern medicine. But we can't do it without you.

Quebec day schools get funding boost

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish day schools will receive a major boost in their funding from the Quebec government, possibly as early as January.

The government will pay for 100 per cent of the general studies portion of the schools' curricula, if they enter into "associate status" with two Montreal-area public school boards.

Education Minister Pierre Reid announced last week that the Education Act provides for this type of contractual arrangement. Jewish schools linked to public boards will enjoy the same rights and privileges as other schools, he said.

Currently, about 60 per cent of the cost of general studies is covered by the government. Effectively, for the Jewish schools, the rate will be 90 per cent because 10 per cent will go as an "administrative fee" to the participating school boards: the English-language Lester B. Pearson School Board and the French-language Commission Scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys.

These smaller boards cover the West Island and St. Laurent areas, respectively, but their association with the Jewish schools is not based on territory.

The increase translates into $10.5 million in new money being put into the Jewish schools annually. Bram Freedman, director of operations and strategic initiatives for FEDERATION CJA, said in an interview with CJN.

Tuitions, however, are not expected to be reduced, Freedman said. The new money will go toward a general enhancement of education, in such areas as professional development and improved resources, he said, adding that the schools are now "under-funded" and in need of upgrading.

News in Brief

CANADA

School Tight for Space

WINNIPEG — The Gray Academy of Jewish Education is facing space constraints for its English as a second language program as it copes with an influx of students from Argentina, Israel and eastern Europe, the Jewish Post & News reported. Last June, the school had 625 students from preschool to Grade 12 – the highest since 1997 – and has 668 this year. In the past two years, 75 to 80 per cent of its enrolment increase has come from children of immigrants, said education director Rory Paul. The school has converted an office and a lounge into classrooms to meet demand.

Hearings Set for Italy

VANCOUVER — A Federal Court judge ruled last week he will hear evidence in Italy from former inmates of a Nazi concentration camp who will testify about former SS guard Michael Seifert. Judge James O'Reilly rejected arguments from defence lawyer Doug Christie that hearings in Italy would be unfair to Seifert. Seifert, who moved to Canada in 1951, was convicted by an Italian court in absentia four years ago of helping kill and torture 11 people at the Bolzano concentration camp in 1944 and 1945. The Italian court sentenced him to life in jail. Canada is seeking to strip him of his citizenship and Italy has asked for his extradition.

Fire at Godfrey Home

TORONTO — A fire caused up to $500,000 damage to the home of Toronto Blue Jays president Paul Godfrey last week, killing one of his four cats. Neither Godfrey nor his wife, Gina, were hurt. Fire officials said the fire was caused when a candle fell over on the dining room tablecloth.

WORLD

Changes at Meat Plant

NEW YORK — The Orthodox Union, the largest U.S. kosher supervisory body, is vowing to make changes at a slaughterhouse it supervises after complaints from a strident animal rights group. People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals said slaughter laws and halachah were being violated at the Postville, Iowa, plant because animals were not being instantly killed. The changes at Agriprocessors Inc. – which markets meat under the Rubashkin/Aaron's Best label – came after PETA released a video questioning the plant's practices – and after it filed lawsuits with the U.S. Department of Agriculture against the plant and the OU.

New Israel Boycott

LONDON — A university in London hosted a conference to launch a new academic boycott of Israel. The event, titled "Resisting Israeli Apartheid: Strategies and Principles," was held Dec. 5 at the School of African and Oriental Studies. Organized by the school's Palestinian society, it saw protests by Jewish and Israeli groups and a counter-event calling for dialogue, not sanctions.

Bronfman Fellowships

NEW YORK — North American students entering Grade 12 next fall can apply for 26 Bronfman Youth Fellowships to spend five weeks in Israel this summer touring, studying and meeting dignitaries. The program is sponsored by the Samuel Bronfman Foundation. Deadline to apply is Jan. 5. Details at www.bronfman.org.

O'Reilly Knocks ADL

NEW YORK — Fox News host Bill O'Reilly said that the Anti-Defamation League is an "an extremist group which finds offence in pretty much everything" and that its national director Abraham Foxman is a "nut" on his syndicated radio call-in show last week. Foxman wrote O'Reilly after he told a caller on his Dec. 3 radio show to "go to Israel" if he is offended by Christian attempts to convert U.S. Jews and celebrate Christmas in U.S. schools. Foxman's letter said the comments play into anti-Semitic canards, and expressed hope O'Reilly would "be more sensitive."

Cotler Gets Honorary Degree from JTS

Irwin Cotler and JTS Chancellor Ismar Schorsch

JERUSALEM — Justice Minister Irwin Cotler received an honorary degree from the Jewish Theological Seminary's Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem last Sunday for his contributions to international human rights law, advocacy against racism and discrimination, and defence of world Jewry.

Cotler, in Israel to receive the honour, said Jews need to become more active in fighting for human rights around the world. "We need to be engaged in the larger struggles for human rights in our times, whether it's protection against the mass atrocity in Darfur today, or previously what happened in the Congo [civil war]," the renowned expert in human rights law told JTA.

Liberal rabbis welcome same-sex marriage finding

Supreme Court said legal definition should change with times

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Reactions in Jewish circles were predictably mixed to last Thursday's landmark opinion by the Supreme Court of Canada which said the government can reword the definition of marriage to include same-sex couples.

Liberal rabbis joined liberal clergy from other faiths to praise the court's finding, but even some of those rabbis and religious groups who oppose same-sex marriage tried to make the best of non-binding opinion. They noted that while part of it is troublesome, it throws the issue to Parliament and protects clergy who are opposed to same-sex marriages from being forced to conduct them.

The high court was responding to three questions that had been posed by the government of former prime minister Jean Chrétien: Does the federal government have exclusive authority to define marriage?; Does the Charter of Rights and Freedoms protect religious groups from having to perform gay weddings against their beliefs?; And is the proposed same-sex marriage law constitutional?

The court declined to answer a fourth question added by Paul Martin when he became prime minister: is the current definition of marriage as a man and a woman unconstitutional?

The court said the legal definition of marriage should change with the times.

"Several centuries ago, it would have been understood that marriage be available only to opposite-sex couples. The recognition of same-sex marriage in several Canadian jurisdictions as well as two European countries [Belgium and the Netherlands] belies the assertion that the same is true today."

The Canadian Coalition of Liberal Rabbis for Same-Sex Marriage, which argued in support of homosexual marriage before the Supreme Court in October, said it was "pleased by the Court's recognition of the need to balance same-sex equality rights with protections for religious freedom."

The coalition, made up of 25 liberal rabbis across Canada, added it is "pleased to support civil and religious same-sex marriage rights and religious freedoms... as a matter of social justice and religious conviction."

The rabbis said their "positive experiences with Jewish gay and lesbian weddings demonstrate that families come in all shapes and sizes, and contribute equally to the social fabric of Canada, with no evidence of any harm to religious or societal interests, as claimed by opponents of same-sex marriage."

They urged the government to move quickly to enshrine into law its proposed redefinition of marriage to include same-sex couples.

Hours after the opinion was delivered, Martin said the government will introduce gay marriage legislation in the new year.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler has said there would be a free vote in the House of Commons.

Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb said he, too, was pleased by the court's opinion. He stressed, though, that he was speaking as an individual Reform rabbi and not as head of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, which includes Reform and Conservative rabbis.

The court's finding "respects and celebrates the diversity of the citizenry of our country," Rabbi Gottlieb stated.

Judaism, he said, "upholds the sanctity and holiness of marriage, and at this time, we call upon all Canadians of good faith to re-engage themselves in the tradition of creating and sustaining strong and vital marriages and families."

At the same time, he and other rabbis noted approvingly that the high court upheld the right of religious communities and their clergy to refuse to consecrate same-sex marriage if they feel it would contravene their faith's teachings.

Contrary to what it called the "alarmist" claims of groups opposed to homosexual marriage, the Canadian Coalition of Liberal

The challenge to Jewish leaders (1)

From the editor's desk

Ever since the notion of Jewish peoplehood was carved into the stone tablets of Jewish experience, we have always believed in having a sense of responsibility for one another.

In liturgy and in history, in poetry and practice, the predicament of one has also been the predicament of many. Kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh. We are all guarantors for each other.

That lofty ideal of mutual responsibility and shared destiny has been one of the sustaining strengths of the Jewish people throughout the generations.

In keeping with that ideal, the Jewish Agency for Israel established the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) in 2002 to look near and far into the global Jewish future.

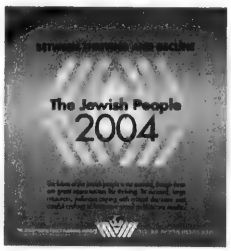
The violent events and the ugly attitudes unleashed worldwide against Israel and the Jewish people by the second intifadah – as horrifically exemplified by the UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001 – undoubtedly were the tripwire for the creation of the institute.

The chairman of its board is Dennis Ross, the former U.S. special envoy for the Middle East in the Clinton administration. Its president is Yehezkel Dror, an internationally renowned visionary thinker and policy planner who is a professor emeritus of political science and public administration at Hebrew University. The board is the proverbial blue-ribbon panel of experts, scholars and involved, committed individuals from across the Diaspora and Israel.

The institute is an independent think tank that has taken upon itself the weighty mission of contributing "to the thriving future and continuity of the Jewish people and Judaism."

JPPPI brings together some of the best Jewish minds in the world with the aim of assisting Jewish organizations and community leaderships worldwide to develop strategies to meet the unique challenges of their respective situations.

Among the projects and studies it is currently undertaking are:
- Jewish demography – trends and policy implications;
- Jewish people crisis management;
- An analysis of the implications of the Iraq war and the new geo-political situation for the Jewish people.



This past summer, the institute published Between Thriving and Decline: The Jewish People 2004, the first of its proposed annual assessments of the state of the Jewish people.

In this column and the next (Dec. 23, the last issue of The CJN for 2004), I shall share with readers some of the report's key findings. For anyone interested in the subject of the Jewish people, they are of immense importance.

The executive summary of the report is itself some 60 pages. It is divided into four sections:
- Main Findings;
- The Jewish People: a Comprehensive Evaluation;
- Jewish Communities around the World: Thriving or Declining?; and
- Strategic Assets, Critical Choice and Strategic Agenda.

The foreword is written by Ross. Without mincing words, he throws out a challenge to the leaders of Jewish communities around the world.

[The report] "offers clear guidelines not only for what should be on the agenda for world Jewry, but also for how to approach such critical priorities as responding to demographic trends, communities at risk and preserving Jewish values…

"It will be up to Jewish leaders worldwide to study its findings, evaluate them, and act on its recommendations. In the process of doing so, lay and professional Jewish leaders should think about which organizations are most well-suited to dealing with particular challenges."

Ross is not reluctant to lay the burdens of leadership upon the shoulders of the individuals who purport to be our leaders.

The report not only provides systematically gathered data, it also assesses and analyzes it. And not only does it analyze the data, it also prescribes broad remedial courses of action.

The introduction is written by Sergio DellaPergola, senior fellow and project head for JPPPI. DellaPergola, a professor at Hebrew U's A. Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry, is the world's pre-eminent demographer of the Jewish people.

DellaPergola frames the challenges facing our leaders in the following terms:

"In the daily, long-term confrontation with a very competitive, and sometimes brutal, global context, the Jewish people and especially the leadership… need to develop appropriate decision-making processes and undertake critical future-shaping choices…

"The book [the full volume] and this report stress an integrated global approach to the internal and external trends affecting the Jewish people in the present and foreseeable future."

In next week's column, I will note some of the report's substantive findings, most of which are quite troubling.

CBC reporter accused of bias against Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two Jewish organizations that monitor the media are taking CBC News to task for violating its own guidelines by allowing its Washington, D.C., correspondent to air personal views that they say are biased against Israel.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and HonestReporting Canada say CBC reporter Neil Macdonald has expressed personal views in several recent reports and commentaries, in contravention of the CBC's own guidelines that restrict editorializing by news correspondents.

Invariably, Macdonald's commentaries favour the Palestinians and come down hard on Israel, say spokespeople for the groups.

"Given Neil Macdonald's reporting over the years, this is consistent with [him] imposing his own theoretical framework on the story," said CIC communications director Paul Michaels. "It appears he is inserting his own viewpoint by lining up people who provide a highly controversial one-sided perspective. It's part of a pattern."

Dov Smith, executive director of HonestReporting Canada, said by inserting his personal views in a commentary piece that ran on the CBC's website, Macdonald leaves open the question of how he can present himself as an unbiased reporter in subsequent stories.

Smith and Michaels point to three recent episodes involving Macdonald that they say fall short of the CBC's own standards. The most recent related to his report on a terrorist attack on the American consulate in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. In his report, Macdonald interviewed Allen Keiswetter of the Middle East Institute who suggested the attacks could be traced back to anger at American policies on Arab-Israeli issues. The United States is "now regarded as being very much in the pockets of [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon. And the second reason of course is Iraq," said Keiswetter, the only person interviewed in the piece.

A second example cited by the two organizations is a "Viewpoints" article titled, "Defining 'terrorism' is harder than you'd think," which was posted on the CBC's website on Dec. 3. In it, Macdonald discusses the UN's attempts to define "terrorism" and he addresses the argument that the definition of terrorism should not apply to those resisting occupation. Macdonald opines that if Texas were occupied, its citizens would "start shooting at any enemy target that presented itself, civilian or not."

He goes on to say that "if Palestinians have committed terror, the Israelis have certainly committed war crimes."

Macdonald also raises the question whether Jewish settlers, "thousands of whom are well armed and overtly bellicose, constitute civilians or combatants."

A third example goes back to May when in a report on abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison facility in Iraq, Macdonald interviewed a pro-Arab lobbyist who suggested, without providing any evidence, that Israeli agents might have played a role in the scandal.

At the time, CBC ombudsman David Bazay investigated complaints about the Abu Ghraib report and found that while Macdonald was not in fact biased, his report on The National exposed the CBC to the appearance of bias.

In a written response last week to The CJN's most recent queries, Cynthia Kinch, director of programming for CBC Television News, responded only to the Jeddah story by noting the context of the interview with Allen Keiswetter, the Middle East expert.

"Mr. Keiswetter was making a point about U.S. foreign policy, expressing an opinion that the bombing can be seen as a reaction to U.S. policy in the Middle East, especially in relation to Israel. Mr. Keiswetter was fully contexted in the piece. We explained who he is and where his expertise comes from.

"The notion that journalists should not include opinion from experts on ANY story is not to understand what journalism is about."

Michaels said the CIC's concerns about Macdonald's reporting go back to at least 2000, when he was stationed in Israel as the network's Middle East correspondent. In September of that year, Macdonald wrote another Viewpoints piece on delays in the Palestinian declaration of statehood. That item prompted a complaint from the CIC, accusing him of presenting a "brazenly one-sided... depiction of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process."

In a response to then CIC national chair Joseph Wilder, Tony Burman, editor-in-chief of CBC News and Newsworld, wrote, "I concluded there were parts of it that could be interpreted as personal opinion rather than simply analysis. That is not something we allow our correspondents. I therefore instructed that it be taken off the website."

Michaels said the CBC's coverage of the Middle East, both in documentaries and news reports, has become much more balanced and fair since Macdonald was assigned to Washington.

However, his Dec. 3 Viewpoints "terrorism" piece reprised "the absolute sarcasm" that characterizes his reports, Michaels said.

The suggestion that Texans would wantonly shoot at anyone, civilian or not, and that there is a question whether Jewish settlers might be considered combatants, Michaels added, "is sarcastic and inflammatory and seems to endorse the killing of innocents. He leaves the impression of an endorsement of killing civilians. I don't know how else to read that one."

Smith said Honest Reporting believes Macdonald is biased against Israel. He "dragged Israel into stories where it doesn't belong and suggested settlers are legitimate targets for terrorists.

As for Macdonald's claim Israel commits war crimes, Smith asked, "In whose world? In his worldview?"

Smith said Honest Reporting has asked its 5,000 subscribers to write to Burman and ask for the CBC to drop Macdonald's reporting.

The CIC has called on Burman to investigate their concerns, while B'nai Brith Canada called on the CBC "to uphold basic journalist standards by immediately reviewing Macdonald's conduct and acting on their findings... Failure to ensure his adherence to core journalistic principles would make the broadcaster complicit in a process through which double standards, demonization and deligitimization of Israel have become the order of the day."

Kolel memorial wall renews an old tradition

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein's idea of creating a yahrzeit wall at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning struck a deep chord with some of the centre's students who had never considered memorializing their loved ones in that way.

Most of them are more familiar with memorial plaques found at synagogues, but at a dedication ceremony last week, Rabbi Goldstein noted that it's "a very old Jewish tradition to study in your loved one's name, and it's believed in Kabbalah – Jewish mysticism – that at that moment you elevate that soul even higher than it already is in heaven."

In keeping with that custom, Kolel study during the month of yahrzeit – the anniversary of the person's death – will be dedicated to those memorialized on the new wall. The plaques will be moved to a designated spot on the wall during the yahrzeit month.

"The public act of memorializing a loved one demonstrates that they were not only an individual but part of a community," said Marcel Wieder, vice-president of Kolel's board, who funded the project with his wife Tina Rosenstein.

Rabbi Goldstein, whose father and sister are memorialized on the wall, said that Kolel is her "'congregation,' made up of Jews from across the whole denominational spectrum, of affiliated and unaffiliated Jews."

Following a moving ceremony that included lighting of a large menorah for the second night of Chanukah – which in Hebrew means "dedication" – Rabbi Goldstein told The CJN that the idea for the wall grew out of her own desire to memorialize her father and sister at Kolel.

"There must be other people who feel like that," she remembered thinking.

Longtime Kolel students Diane and Mal Sacks thought the idea was "so perfect," Diane said in an interview.

"I remember being taught as a child that Jews were the people of the book. The reason Jews and Judaism live is because we keep learning… and both of us think of our parents as being so involved in learning." Her parents, Morris and Florence Gainen, and Mal's father, Solomon Sacks, are memorialized on the wall.

Although the project incorporated outreach to unaffiliated Jews and those who wanted to memorialize non-Jewish relatives, the Sacks, like others who have placed plaques on the wall, do have a synagogue affiliation.

Jan Silverman, a native New Yorker who is now an active member of Darchei Noam Congregation, said "it never felt right" to memorialize her sister at the shul because it wasn't her congregation.

Michele Susan Silverman died 32 years ago of cancer, at age 21. "My sister's passion was learning. I'm so overwhelmed, and so appreciative to Kolel. It's just the most perfect environment, and this so reflects my sister's values."

The wall, designed by Sam and Jack Markle, has more than 50 wooden plaques arranged in the shape of a Magen David around a stylized flame-shaped neon light. There is room for up to 100 plaques on the wall, and a second dedication will be held in the spring.

The look is "quite contemporary… yet retaining a traditional flavour," Rabbi Goldstein said.

"It's beautiful, isn't it?" said one Kolel regular, a woman who converted to Judaism many years ago and had plaques installed in memory of her parents.

"When Rabbi Goldstein reached out to people whose parents and siblings were not Jewish, I was touched. It helps keep their memory alive."

An illuminating tale of two governments

Some eight months ago, on the eve of Passover, the library at the St. Laurent campus of the United Talmud Torahs School in Montreal was set to the torch. According to the note left behind, the arsonist or arsonists apparently regarded the burning of a library in a Jewish school to be an appropriate form of political expression.

By contrast, however, the rest of Canadian society was outraged. People from all walks of life and from all corners of the country condemned the act as a travesty to conscience and country. Countless individuals pitched in with funds and with books to restore and replenish the library for the children who use it.

Last week, fittingly, on the first night of Chanukah, the rebuilt and refurbished library was rededicated.

The government of Quebec chose the occasion to announce that it will allow Montreal's Jewish day schools to have associate status with the English-language Lester B. Pearson School Board or the French-language Commission Scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys. One of the important results of the announcement is to effectively pay for nearly all of the general studies portion of the curriculum in the Jewish day schools. After accounting for a 10 per cent administrative fee to the two school boards, fully 90 per cent of the cost of the general studies portion of the day school curriculum will be covered.

In making the announcement, Quebec Education Minister Pierre Reid pointed out that this type of relationship is provided for in the Education Act, and that private schools entering into the compact enjoy the same rights and privileges as the schools under the public boards.

The new arrangement for the schools does not jeopardize their autonomy, but it does infuse the day school system with fiscal stability and planning certainty. It enables the schools to shore up current pedagogical deficiencies and reach higher standards in the future. It also places parents of children who attend Jewish day schools on equal footing with all other parents of children learning the province's general studies curriculum.

Last week's announcement has had another effect: it places the treatment of day school families in Ontario in sad contrast to the treatment of day school families in Quebec.

To its ongoing shame, Ontario – the largest and one of the wealthiest provinces in Canada – remains the only province in Canada that extends no direct funding assistance to the day schools within its jurisdiction or to the parents of the children who attend those schools.

It is an illuminating tale of two governments: the difference between shedding light and casting a pall.

Troy's language alienates

CJC responds to ARCfest letter

In your Dec. 9 edition, there was a letter from two directors of ARCfest complaining that the Canadian Jewish Congress – and The CJN – had acted irresponsibly in strongly criticizing the use of a stridently anti-Israel poem as part of the ARCfest program in Toronto schools.

We were not alone. The Toronto School Board circulated guidelines to its schools in response to ARCfest in which the Board complained in respect to ARCfest that "scripts were changed [and] unbalanced perspectives presented dealing with social issues without the knowledge of the school."

ARCfest would have us believe that the Palestinian poem was benign. Hardly. The poem in its call "to make revolution" claimed that Israel "stole" his/her grandfather's land and speaks loudly of Israeli snipers and bulldozers wantonly destroying Palestinian lives. Surely without context such images conjure up nothing but disdain and contempt for Israelis and all who would support them. No mention was made, of course, of Palestinian suicide bombers and Islamic terrorists who coldheartedly murder innocent Israelis in restaurants and buses; not a word on how the Palestinian leadership has continually refused to grasp the opportunities for peace that would have ended the very same occupation that the poet decries.

Is there any wonder that the Toronto School Board and the Canadian Jewish Congress strongly criticized ARCfest for introducing such propaganda into our schools?

Premier's Chanukah greetings insincere

To the premier of Ontario and members of the Liberal caucus:

Once again, I have opportunity to write you to acknowledge your greetings to our community in The CJN on the occasion of Chanukah 2004. Given your continued failure to address the issue of unfairness and inequity in funding of faith-based education in this province, and given the retrograde steps you took in this regard with your repeal of the Equity in Education Tax Credit one year ago, while failing to come up with another alternative, your greetings are out of place, unwelcome and cynically offensive. I cannot accept these insincere greetings.

Lauds pigskin success

Football fans congratulate two Jewish businessmen, David Cynamon and Howard Sokolowski, the new owners of the Toronto Argonauts and the winners of the Grey Cup ("Argos savour Grey Cup," CJN, Dec. 2). The only way one can improve on the fact that the Argonauts won, despite the fact the team was hamstrung all season by serious injuries to key players, is to underline the fact that two Jewish boys are successful in a business that centres around tossing a pigskin. Perhaps to offset that, the champagne that was drunk out of the Grey Cup was kosher.

Wants Hillel held accountable

At a recent event at York University held by the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), a group known for its radical anti-Israel activities, literature was handed out on behalf of a York professor, David Noble, ("Professor denounced for York U charges," CJN, Nov. 25), essentially alleging that Jews control York and influence the school's policies. Specific members of the York community were named.

On Nov. 19, Hillel@York, SPHR and York released a joint press release that claimed to "denounce material targeting Jewish members of the York community." However, that was not the end of the story.

On Nov. 24, SPHR released its own press release in which it is stated that "they emphatically support Noble and other like-minded and open-minded professors who individually and collectively elicit critical thought from students on campuses everywhere." They continued that "SPHR is accustomed to being targeted by powerful interests, and to having its members strong-armed by the administration."

SPHR is viewed by many as a fringe organization that is responsible for some of the most offensive and vicious anti-Israel "activism" on our campuses. How could a moderate, tolerant organization such as Hillel, supposedly representing Jewish interests, agree to be part of the original press release?

As parents, students and supporters of Hillel, we should hold Hillel accountable for its hand in helping to legitimize extremist groups such as SPHR.

No Jews need apply

By PIERRE BERTON

In the wartime winter of 1942, when employers of all kinds were desperate for men, a young accountant named Norman Lyons, who had been rejected for military service on medical grounds, started looking for a job.

Lyons was sent by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to a large war plant in Toronto which needed several accountants. After an interview by company officials, he was told there were no vacancies.

He phoned the personnel manager of a second war plant, giving his qualifications in detail. The personnel man said he was looking for a man like Lyons – there was a timekeeper's job available and several accountants' jobs open. When Lyons went around, the personnel man's face changed: Lyons wouldn't want the job, he said. The hours were long, the pay was low and he knew he wouldn't be interested. He didn't even bother to take Lyons' name and address.

Lyons tried a well-known accounting firm. The man he saw read his references, told him he'd have no trouble placing him immediately, said there was a crying need for men like him. Then, as an afterthought, he asked: "By the way, Mr. Lyons, what is your religion?" When Lyons told him, the company representative said sorry, there was nothing for him.

Lyons tried a second accounting firm. He was told: "There's no use beating about the bush. We don't employ Jews here."

The dilemma of Norman Lyons, who represents one of our most important minorities (there are more than 170,000 Jews in Canada, 1½ per cent of the population), has in the past half-dozen years suddenly become a number one topic of conversation. A rash of books, plays, movies and radio broadcasts has dealt with the problem of anti-Semitism. Because of Gentlemen's Agreement and Crossfire and Earth and High Heaven, people are doing more talking and thinking about this particularly vicious expression of race prejudice than ever before. Has the situation, then, changed since Norman Lyons went out looking for a job?

Race prejudice is a difficult thing to measure statistically, but Maclean's made a stab at it a month ago in an effort to find out what comparative job opportunities there were for gentile and Jew in a particular field.

Two experienced girls with similar backgrounds and training were selected to answer newspaper advertisements for stenographers, typists, bookkeepers and filing clerks. These occupations were chosen because they cut right across the industrial and business field from insurance companies to truck manufacturers – and because there is at present a great shortage of experienced help in the secretarial field.

One of the girls took the name of Greenberg, the other of Grimes. The girl with the Jewish-sounding name phoned a prospective employer first, gave her experience and qualifications and asked if she could make an appointment. The girl with the gentile name phoned a few minutes later. The test was tried on 47 employers who were advertising in the newspaper for help.

In 41 instances, the girl with the gentile name was able to make immediate appointments to discuss the job. In six cases, she was told the job was filled. The girl with the Jewish-sounding name (who phoned first) was able to make appointments in only 17 instances. In 21 cases, she was told the job was filled.

In nine other cases she got every kind of a brush-off, from a phone slammed in her ear to a polite voice telling her: "You wouldn't want the job anyway." More than a week later, 11 of the firms which had told her the job was filled were still advertising for help.

The firms which would make appointments with the gentile job-seeker but turned down the Jewish applicant included a perfume manufacturer, a nationally known soap company, a wholesale grocery, a manufacturer of construction equipment, a manufacturer of business machines, a social welfare agency, a large hardware concern, a manufacturer of spices, a manufacturer of trucks, a typewriter company and six insurance companies.

This reporter checked with some of these firms to see if they had any hard and fast policy about employment.

The personnel manager of one of the insurance companies was shocked when shown that somebody at his firm had refused an appointment to a girl with a Jewish-sounding name. He said his company had no racial prejudices and as proof showed that several employees were Jewish. He said there was no discrimination unless "a Jewish applicant and a gentile applicant had equal qualifications – then, I think, the Gentile would be picked."

Race difficult to measure

The personnel manager at a firm of underwriters said that nobody was turned down on a racial basis but that many applicants were turned down because of "temperament." He said that the Jewish "temperament" wasn't conducive to employment among gentiles. "They don't know their place," was the way he explained it. He said he could not explain why the Jewish girl had been told the position was filled when it wasn't.

The personnel manager of the large soap company said his company had no written policy, but "there is an unwritten law that we don't employ Jews." He could give no reason for this, he said, but the company had informed him by word of mouth that Jews were not to be employed.

The personnel manager of one of the war plants which had turned down Norman Lyons, the young accountant, in 1942, insisted that his company had no policy prohibiting employment on racial grounds. As proof, he said that out of his 1,500 employees three were Jewish.

Pierre Berton

Like a good many other personnel men, he could not explain why his company asked questions about race and religion on the cards filled out by applicants. He said he guessed it was because in the old days there had been a good deal of discrimination and nobody had got around to removing the questions.

One personnel man justified these questions on the grounds that his company took a fatherly interest in its employees and liked to know all about them.

A Jewish Vocational Service was recently set up in Toronto to find jobs for Jews who found difficulty getting them through the National Employment Service. The JVS asks: Where did you last apply for a job? Were you asked any questions about race or religion on a form or during an interview? Were you offered a job?

Of the 113 job-hunters who answered these questions in the first six months of 1948, 60 reported that they had been asked no racial or religious questions, 50 were offered jobs. Of 53 applicants who had been asked these questions, only 20 were offered jobs.

Under the Fair Employment Practices Code (FEPC) of the State of New York (the Ives-Quinn Act of 1945), it has become illegal for a prospective employer to ask about race and religion. Opponents of an FEPC in this country argue that "you can't legislate against intolerance." However, a report prepared at the request of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice shows that out of 450 job applicants, only seven per cent were refused jobs by reason of religion in New York City, while in 11 other large U.S. cities (where no FEPC exists) 15 per cent were refused jobs because they were Jewish.

The recently published 1941 census figures on distribution of occupations by ethnic groups show as graphically as cold statistics can the dilemma of the Jew in Canada.

In occupations where he has to work for somebody else (when that somebody else is a gentile), he hasn't the same chance of employment as his gentile opposite number. And when he does get into these occupations, his chances for advancement and promotion aren't nearly as good as they would be if he were not a Jew.

The census figures show that in professions where a man is his own boss (medicine, law, dentistry) the proportion of Jews is higher than the 15 per thousand part that the Jews form in the total population. (Seven per cent of all lawyers are Jewish; similarly six per cent of all doctors, five per cent of all dentists.)

But in jobs where an employee's security depends on a gentile employer (teaching, banking, engineering), the number of Jewish professionals is much below the number that might be expected to be employed on a per capita basis.

It has been argued that certain vocations – agriculture for instance – "just don't attract" Jews. The Jews themselves agree that agriculture is far down the list. Nonetheless, Jewish farmers represent 1.19 per cent of the farm population, which isn't far under their percentage (1.57 per cent of the total population). On the other hand, banking can reasonably be expected to be equally as attractive as agriculture – if not more attractive. Yet out of 27,193 persons employed in banking in Canada only 27 are Jewish.

Similarly in the nursing profession, gentiles outnumber Jews five to one on a per capita basis. In teaching, the ratio is three to one. Although the census shows that the number of employable Jews is Canada represents 1.5 per cent of the employable population, only one-tenth of one per cent of all Canadian engineers are Jews. Engineering is considered one of the toughest of all professions for a Jew to break into. Recently, a member of the engineering faculty of the University of Toronto told me, "If a Jewish student came to me and asked whether he should go into engineering, I think I'd ask him to reconsider in the light of the few job opportunities available to him."

The judicature is almost closed to Jews; the 1941 census showed that out of 578 Jews in the legal profession, only one had been elevated to the bench. (The ratio of gentile judges was one to every 17 gentile lawyers.) And although one-20th of all gentiles engaged in education had risen to be high school principals or university professors, only one-34th of all Jews employed in the same profession had been able to reach the higher status. There were, in fact, only 18 Jewish high school principals and university faculty members in Canada at census time.

In some of the federal vocational training schools set up during the war to train war workers quickly, Jewish applicants found they couldn't take the course unless they got a "sponsor" – somebody willing to employ them after the course was over. The schools felt they weren't justified in training people who wouldn't be offered a job. Jews were considered "problem" cases along with enemy aliens, Negroes, men about to be called up, married women, etc. – anyone the schools considered would have trouble getting a job. One Jewish girl who was turned down for a course at Danforth Tech in Toronto then registered under a gentile alias and was admitted. On graduation, she was interviewed successfully by a large war plant and told to report for work the next day. When she turned up, she was rejected. No reason was given.

Similarly, employers phoning National Selective Service in the early months of its formation found they were being asked whether they had any racial or religious preferences. When one employer said he hadn't, he then reported that the NSS employee asked: "Even if they're Jews?" NSS,which has denied an overall policy of discrimination, found it necessary to issue a directive to its employees that such questions were not to be asked.

On stairs

Last Shabbat, I was in a different synagogue and I found the change of place unsettling. It was intriguing to note the difference in perception and performance when locations shift. Clearly, geography counts, as in the oft-repeated axiom of good business practice: location, location, location.

Norma Bannel Joseph in Montreal

More to the point of my experience, the rabbis in the Talmud warn against changing position during services. They noted that a degree of familiarity with our visual surroundings is necessary for proper intention and consistency.

Pointedly, during the year of mourning, it is customary to sit in a different seat – a purposeful undermining of our normal sense of presence. I found that dislocation during mourning to be helpful, as it enabled me to remember and to acknowledge my loss.

So, during prayers this past Shabbat, I sat and wondered at the difference that location effected in me.

It dawned on me that I was distracted by the stairs. The stairs leading to the ark with the Torah scrolls were in the middle of the bimah. Straight up the middle, that is how the men ascended to the Torah. In my synagogue, the stairs are on the sides of the stage, so our men get there sideways.

What a difference in positioning and attitude. I wondered at the message in the two structures. One architect visualized a direct confrontation with the holy – a powerful, even aggressive, approach, as if to say, "Here I am." There was no hesitation in placing congregants in front of our people's heritage.

The other architect was more indirect – slower to approach the sacred, more humble, and perhaps afraid to place daveners directly in front of the sacrosanct.

Which is best? Which mode accommodates our styles of prayer and dedication?

Surely we need both. There are times in life when a direct approach is indispensable. Often, when we face our greatest challenges, we must be straightforward and frontal, aggressively taking on a duty and bravely encountering the things we hold dear. Yet, there are times when a lateral approach is required, times when a tactical flank position is most productive, and even powerful. And that is perhaps the greatest challenge of both prayer and life: learning when to use which technique.

When Jacob dreamed of a stairway to heaven, he saw angels going up and down. That, too, is a description of directions of significance. Sometimes we go up to a special encounter, and other times we must descend.

By themselves, these directions have no ultimate significance. They reflect how we approach and deal with things that we honour and admire. Up and down, lateral and frontal, all speak of a devotion to, and acceptance of, life in a contested but redeemable world.

Looking forward, looking back

At the end of this momentous year, I look back at some of the themes I addressed in my columns and try to guess at what issues will continue to vex – or delight – us in 2005.

I wrote about family bonds, joys and regrets – all the elements that make up our closest relationships.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I reviewed the books Occidentalism (by Avishai Margolit and Ian Buruma), which probed the hatred of the West that drives Islamic terrorism and informs other anti-western attitudes, and Terror in the Name of God (Jessica Stern), in which the author profiled a number of terror movements, including, unfortunately, those within our own community that promote Jewish violence.

It is apparent that many gays and lesbians want to include themselves and their partners in our synagogues and schools, and to serve as leaders and scholars. Yet we continue to exclude them.

The movie The Passion of the Christ raised the spectre of renewed anti-Jewish theologies penetrating the churches, while on the secular side, the infamous list of Jewish neoconservatives in the Vancouver-based magazine Adbusters was a throwback to Nazi-era lists that blamed all the ills of the world on Jews.

Finally, what passes for Canadian foreign policy astonished me. While AIDS and civil war eat up Africa, we sit on our hands. Our leverage, military or through aid, is minimal. Canadian foreign policy had reached its nadir in the failure to assist Gen. Romeo Dallaire as he tried vainly to stop the slaughter in Rwanda. Canadian social policy, federal and provincial, continued to grind the faces of the poor, denying them supports such as affordable housing while collecting massive amounts of GST and PST and squandering millions on poor equipment for the military, unethical payments to party cronies and just plain incompetence.

How will these issues play out in the next year? While I claim no prophetic insight, I think we will continue to see further erosion of the social network that we are so justifiably proud of. My own provincial government, having cut social services to the bone, now (in an election year, what a surprise) finds two billion dollars to spend on the 2010 Winter Olympics, a rapid transit line and other big-ticket items. What will social service agencies do to recover? Your guess is as good as mine. It's always easier to tear down than build up.

Why are these public policy issues of concern for us as Jews? Because we are bound by ethical obligations written in the Torah to make sure our society is fair and compassionate, to enable those in need to become independent of aid. We must look beyond our own borders and the "I'm all right Jack" mentality of the neo-conservatives to places in the world that need tikkun (repair). Perhaps the recent choice of the late Tommy Douglas as the "Greatest Canadian" is a sign that Canadians in general wish to return to a kinder public policy stance, at least at home.

I do not see the issue of homosexuality going away, and, unfortunately, I do not see even my own congregation discussing it. I am ashamed of my own denomination's attitudes, and I see no way of changing them.

Instead of leaning on the support of Christian evangelicals, who have their own agenda for us, and instead of wringing our hands over the antipathy of some academics, politicians, union leaders and other public figures toward Israel, there are things we can and should do.

We can insist that universities reassert their administrative and governing authority and protect pro-Israel speakers. We can insist that Jewish students be protected from slander and harassment. We can expose the lies about Israel and Jews in the media and other public platforms.

As Jews, we have much in common with mainstream Christian denominations, such as the United, Anglican and Catholic churches. Their instinct for social justice and our commitment to tikkun olam can be a bridge to new understanding. But if our clergy and advocacy bodies do not cross that bridge – which is, I agree, fraught with obstacles – we will never be able to have them hear us when we ask for their understanding of Middle East complexities.

Canadian judges and the wisdom of Solomon

We are told that during the Days of Awe, God passes judgment as to whether each of us will be inscribed for the coming year in the Book of Life. In the Torah, we read about the important role judges and their judgments play in key passages of our theology. And we recount the story about the wisdom of King Solomon in rendering judgment and settling a dispute between two women over who was the real mother of a child. Judges and judgment are integral to our biblical history.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The same is true of modern western society. Judges play a key role in resolving contentious issues. But it appears to many that they do significantly more – that they render de facto policy-making decisions that affect the nature and fabric of our society. These have included rulings on such issues as same sex marriage, hate propaganda, public funding of certain medical treatments, parochial schooling, the right of prisoners to vote in federal elections, and many others.

This has led to the allegation by some that judges are usurping the traditional role of elected politicians in making public policy. The criticism is often aimed at so-called "judicial activism." But that phrase is misleading, as "activism" is nothing more than judges performing their sworn duties.

The notion of judicial activism is neither new nor recent. Judges have been setting policy since Confederation, long before we had a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. And although judges do increasingly function as policy-makers, the complaints are highly exaggerated. The "new" role of judges under the Charter of Rights was cast upon them by agreement of democratically elected politicians in the early 1980s. Judges did not seek this role.

Moreover, politicians cleverly use the courts to decide contentious issues because they do not have the courage or inclination to make difficult decisions themselves. Often, governments will specifically refer a controversial issue, such as same sex marriage, to the courts and thus avoid or delay taking the responsibility of making a decision themselves. When called upon to decide these issues, judges have a constitutional responsibility to do so.

These issues almost always arise in the context of litigation under our constitutionally entrenched Charter of Rights. It's true that since the enactment of the Charter, judges have been called upon a lot more frequently to make such controversial judgments. It is also true that these lightning rod issues attract a great deal of media scrutiny, and consequently more public attention, than ever before.

What are some ways that judges make changes to laws that violate the Charter? Most drastically, a judge may declare that an entire statute is of no force and effect. Alternatively, a judge may sever or remove an offensive provision of a statute. And finally, a judge may add a word or phrase to the statute in order to make a law conform to the Charter. This occurred when judges added the phrase "sexual orientation" to anti-discrimination laws so that they would conform to constitutional guarantees of equality.

Accusations of judicial activism have led some critics to call for the reform of our current process of judicial appointments – particularly to the Supreme Court of Canada. Suggestions include the adoption of U.S.-style confirmation hearings for candidates nominated to that high office. In Alberta, there have even been suggestions that judges be elected at the provincial court level. For many reasons, these proposals are misguided and unnecessary.

In Canada, we should take comfort in the responsible ways that judges have addressed Charter issues. Statistically, most challenges for alleged Charter violations have been unsuccessful. And when they are successful, judges have responded in a measured and sensible manner when confronting these issues.

As Canadians, we should recognize that our judiciary is one of the best conflict-resolving institutions in the world, conforming to the wisdom and sensibility that distinguished our biblical forefathers.

The Kirshner File

The following books, published in the last little while, will appeal to a wide range of readers.

Bernard Wasserstein is a scholar whose storehouse of knowledge is vast and whose writing style is lucid and accessible. He brings these qualities to bear in Israelis and Palestinians: Why Do They Fight? Can They Stop? (Yale University Press). In this thought-provoking work, he challenges conventional wisdom, claiming that Israel's century-long struggle with the Palestinians stems not from irrational ethnic and religious hatreds, but from such rational factors as population and environmental pressures.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Itamar Rabinovich, a Middle East specialist of the first rank who was Israel's chief negotiator with Syria while serving as ambassador to the United States in the 1990s, has updated and revised his enlightening book, Waging Peace: Israel and the Arabs, 1948-2003 (Princeton University). The thrust of his fast-paced narrative deals with the Oslo peace process and its collapse. In conclusion, Rabinovich suggests that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's endorsement of Palestinian statehood is contradicted by his support of settlement expansion in the West Bank and claims that the quest for a comprehensive Arab-Israeli agreement has been abandoned. He also believes that the turmoil in Iraq will affect Israel's relationship with the Arab world and warns that Iran's nuclear weapons program will have a direct and far-reaching impact on Israel.

Through the story of three young Arab militants caught up in the second intifadah, Laetitia Bucaille – a French academic who has lived in the territories – examines the strains and upheavals currently affecting Palestinian society. In Growing Up Palestinian (Princeton University Press), a seamless blend of social and political commentary, she writes that Israel should not treat the Palestinian question solely as a security issue, and that, in general, the Palestinians are ill-prepared to begin a new and hopeful phase in their relations with Israel.

First published in 1996, Dilip Hiro's 639-page, alphabetically-arranged compendium, The Essential Middle East (Carroll & Graf), is a useful addition to any library. But when it comes to Israel, his objectivity sometimes falters. In this era of suicide attacks in Israel, David Horowitz's compelling Still Life With Bombers (Random House Canada) falls under the heading of mandatory reading. His book is a mixture of vivid reportage about the terrorism that haunts Israel and a telling analysis of how the conflict can be resolved peacefully. In a key paragraph, Horowitz, the editor of The Jerusalem Post, observes: "There is only one avenue, then, to maintaining Israel as both a Jewish state and a democratic one: finding the negotiated terms for territorial separation from Palestinians… We can do that only when they have a leadership in place that honestly seeks coexistence, encouraged by the knowledge that we are again ready to offer viable terms."

William Shawcross, a distinguished foreign correspondent, has written an illuminating account about the 2003 war in Iraq. Allies (Public Affairs) argues that though the United States and Britain may have created a new swamp in which terrorists can breed and flourish, their decision to unseat Saddam Hussein's regime was the right thing to do. As for the future, Shawcross is unequivocal: "The responsibility of America and its allies is immense. The only certainty is that they must succeed. The alternatives are too terrible to contemplate."

At the start of the allied invasion of Iraq, Matt McAllester, a Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter, was arrested and thrown into the notorious Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad. In Blinded by the Sunlight (HarperCollins), he poignantly describes his ordeal and Saddam's totalitarian repression.

Historical Atlas of Islam (Harvard University Press), by Malise Ruthven and Azim Nanji, is an excellent reference work that ranges far and wide. It covers such topics as Muslim languages and ethnic groups, the spread of Islam, the rise and fall of the Ottoman empire, Muslim minorities in China, Saudi Arabia, the Palestinians, Islamic arts and the state of human rights in Muslim societies. Irshad Manji's The Trouble With Islam (Random House Canada) is a penetrating and courageous call for reform in Islam. "I'm asking questions from which we can no longer hide," she writes in this iconoclastic work.

The infamous anti-Semitic Czarist forgery, Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which has gained a certain degree of respectability in the Muslim world of late, is the subject of The Non-Existent Manuscript (University of Nebraska Press) by Italian scholar Cesare De Michelis. In this scholarly treatise, he casts new light on this despicable tract, closely analyzing its text and the circumstances under which it was conceived.

Alan Levinson's Between Philosemitism and Antisemitism: Defenses of Jews and Judaism in Germany, 1871-1932 (University of Nebraska Press), based on works of fiction and private correspondence, should be read in conjunction with the above book. The pace may be plodding, but the journey is quite illuminating.

What is the relationship between the Holocaust and Israel? Yosef Gorny, an Israeli professor of history whose Polish family was swept up by World War II, delves into that issue in Between Auschwitz and Jerusalem (VallentineMitchell). He focuses on the period from the Eichmann trial to the building of the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

Three years ago, Jan Gross published Neighbors, a disturbing account of the mass murder of Jews by Poles in the town of Jedwabne. The incident touched off a trans-Atlantic debate on the nature of Polish anti-Semitism. The debate continues in The Neighbors Respond: The Controversy Over the Jedwabne Massacre in Poland (Princeton University Press), edited by Antony Polonsky and Joanna Michlic. In this volume, a chorus of Polish voices, including residents of Jedwabne, grapple with this legacy of the Holocaust.

Pilgrimage From Darkness: Nuremberg to Jerusalem (University Press of Mississippi), by David Feldman, makes for riveting reading. This is the seemingly unbelievable story of Oskar Eder, a German who bought into Nazi lore, disavowed it, worked on a kibbutz, studied Hebrew, converted to Judaism, changed his name and married an Israeli Holocaust survivor.

The two interlocking questions Eva Hoffman poses in After Such Knowledge: Memory, History and the Legacy of the Holocaust (Public Affairs) are: How are the memories of genocide passed on from the victims to their children, and what responsibility do they have in keeping these memories alive? In her considered view, moral passions need to be supplanted by moral thought. As she puts it: "There is a Jewish tradition that says we must grieve for the dead fully and deeply; but that mourning must also come to its end. Perhaps that moment has come, even as we must continue to ponder and confront the knowledge that the Shoah has brought us in perpetuity."

In Night Voices (McGill-Queen's University Press), Heather Laskey recreates the world of Jewish Holocaust survivors who remained in Poland after the war to build a just socialist society, and who were bitterly disillusioned by the state-sponsored anti-Semitism that shattered their dreams. From the Gestapo to the Gulags (VallentineMitchell), by Zev Katz, turns on a Jewish family in Poland that suffered at the hands of Nazism and Stalinism. Janusz Bardach, an ethnic Pole in the Soviet Union, suffered the indignities of Stalinism after being arrested as an "enemy of the people" in 1941 while serving in the Red Army. In Surviving Freedom After the Gulag (University of California Press), he recounts his bitter experiences and his quest to rebuild his life.

Stuart Eizenstat was a top-ranking official in the U.S. government whose mandate was to resolve post-Holocaust issues ranging from dormant bank accounts to confiscated property. In the paperback edition of Imperfect Justice: Looted Assets, Slave Labor and the Unfinished Business of World War II (Public Affairs), he discusses the arduous talks in which he took part in Switzerland, Germany, Austria and France.

The paperback edition of The New Joys of Yiddish (Random House Canada), Leo Rosten's revised classic, is in bookshops. It's educational as well as hilarious. And in a similar vein, The Mensch Chef (Random House Canada), by Mitchell Davis, is filled with edible treasures.

Fiction: Contemporary Jewish Writing in Canada (University of Nebraska Press), edited by Michael Greenstein, showcases talents from Leonard Cohen to Matt Cohen. The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature (Cambridge University Press) consists of 14 learned essays edited by Michael Kramer and Hana Worth-Nesher. Yiddish South of the Border (University of New Mexico Press), edited by Alan Astro, features short stories, poems and memoirs from Latin America. Contributors to Lost Tribe:Jewish Fiction from the Edge (HarperCollins) address the legacy of the Holocaust, sex and religious intolerance.

Words, words, words: The second edition of Katherine Barber's formidable Canadian Oxford Dictionary (Oxford University Press) has been published, as has Orin Hargraves' New Words (Oxford University Press), a primer of new words and definitions that have entered the English language.

Last but not least, HarperCollins presents The Dorothy Parker Audio Collection of her finest short stories, including Big Blonde, Cousin Larry and Dusk Before Fireworks.

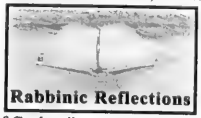
Shepherds of Israel

By RABBI RONALD WEISS



Rabbinic Reflections

In this week's Torah portion, we read, "My brothers and the house of my father that was in the land of Canaan have come to me... And the men are shepherds, for they have been men of cattle... And they told Pharoah that they have come to dwell in the land for there is no pasture available to the sheep of your servants for the famine is strong in Canaan, your servants request that they be permitted to live in the land of Goshen."

The late Rabbi Joseph Ber Soloveitchik wondered why Joseph felt it was necessary to tell his brothers to inform Pharoah that they were shepherds. After all, they were honest men and could be expected to tell the truth if Pharoah asked about their profession. Rabbi Soloveitchik's answer is based on the statement the brothers made that they have "come to dwell in the land because there is no pasture available to our cattle" in the land of Canaan.

It would seem from their statement that although they would be able to survive the hardship of the famine personally, their animals would perish. Their coming to Egypt was, thus, to be seen as an act of mercy taken on behalf of their flocks.

Rabbi Soloveitchik said further that there are two terms used to refer to shepherds, "anshei mikneh" (cattle ranchers) and "ro'ay tzon" (shepherds of sheep). Quoting the Ramban, Rabbi Moshes ben Nachman, Rabbi Soloveitchik stated that the brothers told Pharoah that they owned many cattle. However, they were different from other cattle ranchers in that they took care of their animals themselves. They tended their cattle in the tradition of Avraham Avinu – they did not employ others to assist them in taking care of their flocks.

Though they could well afford it, there were no slaves or other workers designated to perform specific menial tasks. There was no distinction between owner and servant in that all had the same title: "ro'ay tzon." The simple question is why should the owners work at such a job when servants could be assigned the task instead?

The explanation, Rabbi Soloveitchik said, is that the truly caring shepherd must develop the characteristic of patience. It is not always easy to wait until the animals are ready, or until a specific juncture, to perform a specific task on their behalf. As well, the shepherd must care for each and every lamb in his flock. To the shepherd, the individual is extremely important; the needs of each of the sheep must be assessed on their own and treated appropriately. These are qualities required not just of a shepherd, but of any leader of the Jewish people.

While these are qualities of Jewish leadership, they do not apply exclusively to those we look to for guidance and direction. We, too, must be sensitive to the needs of everyone around us. Each and every one of us must constantly be aware of the need to develop patience and sensitivity as personal characteristics. Only with these traits deeply ingrained within us will we be able to respond appropriately to the multitude of needs (and personalities) that surround us.

Shabbat shalom.

The 'five per cent plan' for funding Jewish day schools

By MICHAEL ORR

School Parents SPEAK

Whatever our differences, committed Jews are united by the vision that our children and descendants should continue to identify with our Jewish heritage.

Education is the key to realizing this vision, since children cannot be expected to identify with something they don't know very much about. As an Ontario court accepted in 1992 (in the Adler case, the ultimately unsuccessful test case brought by parents seeking provincial funding for Jewish day schools), "the Jewish community's survival as an identifiable and practising religious community depends upon broad access for Jewish children to Jewish day schools." And as much as it is the foundation of Jewish continuity, Jewish education is also the foundation of all Jewish causes.

One of the key barriers to making Jewish education accessible to all is cost. As tuition for Toronto Jewish schools has risen at a rate that's higher than the rate of inflation over the last decade, the participation rate in Jewish schools has dropped. Many families who want their children to receive a Jewish day school education end up sending them to melting-pot public schools because they can't afford tuition fees. And expecting parents to absorb the entire cost of educating their children, with a subsidy system geared to lower income earners that forces middle class families to live like paupers, is a large part of the problem.

It does not have to be like this. The members of the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools have, on average, much lower tuition fees. Many of its schools have a family cap on tuition – for example, no more than $7,500 per family.

But where would the money to achieve something like this come from? As long as our government is unwilling to eliminate explicit religious discrimination from education funding, we must take a more self-reliant approach.

Chicago philanthropist George Hanus has developed the "five per cent plan" to make Jewish education available to every Jewish child without cost being a barrier. The plan is based on establishing a community norm that every committed Jew gives five per cent of his or her assets upon death to support Jewish day school education in the manner of the donor's choosing. Everyone can participate without hardship, not just major donors, whose patience and generosity are constantly being tapped.

With the proper community leadership and support, the "five per cent plan" could mine some very substantial new resources. Most people who would be willing to make a bequest have never been seriously approached to do so, and there is no general network of school-related endowment funds that makes it easy for donors to provide this kind of support. Furthermore, individuals are not as likely to make a bequest if it is not part of a well-publicized community strategy to have everyone do so.

One bequest would not have much of an impact, but combined with others as part of a scheme like this, it could have a dramatic impact in making Jewish education accessible to all.

Given what is at stake, participation in such a plan should be strongly encouraged by all community institutions. As well as making it a high-profile community initiative, with the usual endorsements and positive recognition for donors, schools and shuls should, where feasible, make participation in the plan a condition of enrolment or membership. Large donors and foundations should exercise their considerable leverage to insist that the community embrace this plan to ensure that everyone is giving a fair share to providing a solid foundation for Jewish continuity.

What are we waiting for?

God and evil

Farewell to God* by Charles Templeton, McClelland and Stewart, paperback.

Books
Bernard Baskin

A gust of wind suddenly uprooted a tree in the Burlington Royal Botanical Gardens and a 10-year-old boy, visiting with his classmates, was crushed to death. Soon, thereafter, in the Welland area, a pregnant woman and her seven children died in an all-engulfing house fire.

Why is evil so widespread? Why do the innocent suffer? In his challenging book, Farewell to God, Charles Templeton cries out, "How could a loving God originate as part of his creation such horrible illnesses as encephalitis, cerebral palsy, the various cancers, leprosy, Alzheimer's and other incurable diseases, and permit them indiscriminately to afflict tens of thousands of men, women and children?"

Elisha ben Avuyah was a Talmudic sage of the third generation (about CE 70 to CE 140) who rejected the notion of divine providence. An outstanding scholar and teacher of the renowned Rabbi Meir, he could not reconcile the suffering of the innocent with a benign deity.

When Rabbi Meir was asked how he could continue to respect and even learn from Elisha, he declared that "even a gentile who observes the Torah (i.e., leads a righteous life) is equal to a high priest."

Elisha's life story is memorably told by Milton Steinberg in his novel As a Driven Leaf (1939).

No issue in theology or religion is more crucial than the problem of suffering. On one level, it relates to specific forms of pain individuals experience. On another level, however, it relates to the whole nature of existence, as people inevitably question the very foundation of life. Is the world fair and just? Is God good, kind, and merciful? If there is a God, why is He unable or unwilling to prevent the terrible disasters and wrenching tragedies? Is God weak but not omnipotent? Is God omnipotent but not compassionate?

We who are contemporaries to the slaughter of innocent millions can ask questions with a poignancy and pathos unequalled in the past. We are confronted by a dark, insoluble enigma beyond our comprehension.

Are there any guideposts on the lonely road of sadness, which can lead our feet back to paths of light? Have the experience and wisdom of the past any counsel and guidance for us, so that we may bravely endure the dark?

We can be helped in maintaining our balance during life's trials if we remember that sadness is the universal heritage of humankind. The contingency of pain is the only condition on which love, friendship and happiness are ever offered to us. This recognition is the hallmark of maturity.

Rabbi Simon Greenberg has written, "We speak very often of 'victims of circumstances' – people whose souls are crushed beneath the wheels of unfortunate events. We would do well to start thinking of 'victors of circumstance' – people who use even negative circumstance and distill from it some new insight into life, keener understanding or more beautiful character. We often speak of people who were successful because they knew how to take advantage of good 'breaks.' We would do well to start thinking that people can be successful if they have the wisdom to capitalize on their bad breaks."

Out of love and loss comes sorrow, but, also, the blessing of helpfulness. And out of the light we bring to others comes light for ourselves – the light of solace, of strength, and of transfiguring and consecrating purpose.

There is wisdom in the widespread, traditional Jewish practice of taking a little whisky on returning from the cemetery after a burial and before drinking it, raising the glass and saying, "L'chayim" – to life!

Ancient Jewish coins

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

So did you get gelt?

No, not the chocolate kind but honest-to-goodness gelt. Ancient coins give us an almost unique opportunity: to hold and even own an authentic part of our culture. We can learn about these coins on the Internet, and even buy them there. But before you spend a cent, know what you are doing.

For a good introduction into the history of minting in Israel, drop by the Israel Museum [http://tinyurl.com/3t3ml]. Coins were first minted in Gaza about BCE 400 and later in Jerusalem about 500 years later. The earliest coin known to be minted in Jerusalem bears a picture of a lily and the word "Yehud." The Bank of Israel reproduced this design when it issued its One New Sheqel coin in 1985. [www.bankisrael.gov.il//catal/c39.htm]

From there, go to the Numismatics entry at the JewishEncyclopedia.com, the lengthiest on this topic that I have found on the web. [http://tinyurl.com/4t7c2] JewishEncyclopedia.com calls itself "the only free Jewish encyclopedia on the Internet." However, there is a catch. The website contains the complete contents of the 12-volume Jewish Encyclopedia, which was originally published from 1901 to '06. But since it was completed almost a century ago, it does not include events that have happened since then.

In Exodus 20:4, we are warned against making "a graven image, nor any manner of likeness, of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth." [http://tinyurl. com/k1ir] That restriction posed a challenge to Jews who began minting coins from the reign of Hasmonean king John Hyrcanus in BCE 134 to the end of the Second Revolt in CE 135. Unlike the Persians, Syrians, Egyptians and Romans who decorated their coins with busts of their emperors, the Jews turned elsewhere for inspiration. Read more about "Lulavs, Lilies and Lyres" in Jewish Heritage Online Magazine. [www.jhom.com/topics/money]

Are you sitting on a cache of coins from the time of the Maccabees – or a hoard from the time of Herod – and want to find out what they're worth? Then join in at the "Forvm Ancient Coins" Biblical and Judean Coins numismatics discussion board. Not only do most people pose questions, but they also scan their coins. One person wanted to know whether his coin really was an antique. The answer: "This is [a] modern coin. The easy way to tell is [by] the Hebrew on the coin. It is new Hebrew, not ancient." [http://tinyurl.com/4xghh]

For more advice, join the online community of numismatists NUMISM-L Ancient and Medieval Coin List. [http://tinyurl.com/5a2aj] And don't miss the site created by The American Israel Numismatic Association. The association was established to study Israel's coinage, past and present. [www.amerisrael.com/] Yahoo lists a number of vendors of old coins. [http://tinyurl.com/ 6j64j]

But before you buy, be careful! In Ancient Coins & Modern Fakes, Dennis Kroh writes about notorious and common coin scams. "There have been forgeries of ancient coins for as long as there has been coinage." Novices to coin collecting are amazed that coins of the ancient world are obtainable at all for any price (They are all in museums, aren't they!) Kroh says it's no wonder that when tourists purchase "ancient" coins, they are usually paying much more for counterfeits than what the authentic items would cost. [http://tinyurl.com/6gms6]

So far we've been looking at old coins from a modern perspective. But how would a resident of ancient Jerusalem feel if he could hold a handful of modern Israeli change? Strange familiarity. Since the State of Israel was founded, its mint has always looked to the past for the designs and symbols to engrave onto its coins. The Jerusalem through Coins website illustrates ancient coins with grapes, pomegranates and, of course, menorahs, alongside their modern counterparts. [www.jerusalemcoins.com/Jerusalem/conflsrael.htm]

So the next time you find yourself in the departure lounge at Ben Gurion Airport, don't get rid of all your spare change. Bring home a bit of history.

BJCC, Mississauga shul vandalized

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Large rocks were used to smash windows and glass doors at Solel Congregation in Mississauga in an overnight attack last week. Three days later, anti-Semitic graffiti were spray-painted on the bridge leading to the south parking lot at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre in Toronto.

The two attacks are not thought to be related, said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

The former is being investigated by Peel Regional Police as vandalism or an attempted break-in, while the latter is being treated by Toronto police services as "a serious hate crime," he said, adding that "they may have some leads in the case."

A caretaker discovered the damage at Solel when he came to work last Thursday morning, said Judy Miller, president of the 30-year-old, 310-family congregation.

Three of the four windows in Rabbi Lawrence Englander's office were smashed, rocks landed inside the building and there was "glass all over," she added. There was also damage to glass doors at the side of the building and to a library window, both of which were also smashed.

"You always feel a little violated when something like this happens," said Miller. "With the shattered glass, you always think of Kristallnacht. It's very upsetting."

Two years ago, during the day of Erev Yom Kippur, the side door panel was also smashed with a rock. Damage at the time cost $1,800 to repair, said Miller.

The synagogue is involved in an interfaith group that meets monthly and has "always felt comfortable" in Mississauga, a community about half an hour west of Toronto that is also home to Palestine House, a Palestinian community building.

The BJCC attack involved "some pretty ugly anti-Semitic graffiti" that had been spray-painted on the bridge, said Farber.

He believes the attacks may have neo-Nazi or white supremacist links.

The graffiti were covered up immediately, and were removed as soon as police had finished working at the scene.

Menorah lit in memory of Matti

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the fifth year in a row, a 13-foot menorah was lit at G. Ross Lord Park on the first night of Chanukah in memory of 15-year-old Matti Baranovski on the spot where he was beaten and killed in 1999.

At the ceremony organized by the Russian Jewish Community Centre, MPP Monte Kwinter, minister of community safety and correctional services, read a letter from Premier Dalton McGuinty, who acknowledged that time will not heal the family's wounds, but said that "as we light the menorah, may its glow remind us of Matti."

Insp. John Wallace of Toronto Police 32 Division read a letter from Chief Julian Fantino, who said the event was particularly tragic because Matti's death came at the hands of other youth.

Noting that the ceremony took place only days after 16-year-old Drew Stewart was killed in East York by a group of teens after defending a friend who was pregnant, Fantino said in the letter that the "[ceremony] sends a message that we won't let violence continue."

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, said he wished he could tell the crowd that Toronto was a safer city today, "but [recently] a young boy was also murdered by young people.

"My daughter was a young girl at the time of Matti's death, and she has had the opportunity to [grow] into an adult. When we light this candle, let it be a light of safety, learning and understanding."

Matti's mother Olga, thanked the crowd for attending the ceremony and for remembering her son.

Also last week, on Thursday, Vaughan held its annual chanukiyah lighting at the Vaughan Civic Centre, hosted by Michael DiBiase and presided over by Rabbi Mendel Kaplan and Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum of Chabad Lubavitch. And earlier on Erev Chanukah, Kwinter lit the first candle on a giant chanukiyah at Queen's Park in a ceremony that was also presided over by Chabad Lubavitch.

Sharp built a world of Jewish spirit

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Builder, philanthropist and community leader Max Sharp died at home, surrounded by his family. He was just short of his 103rd birthday.

He was eulogized at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where he was actively involved in the building of both the synagogue's former location on St. Clair Avenue and its present location on Glencairn Avenue.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman, Shaarei Shomayim's senior rabbi, said, "Certainly, we all know of his professional life as a builder where he was a pioneer in so many ways, including a pioneer in the building of the land of Israel, from his days in his youth on Israel's first kibbutz, to major hotels.

"But perhaps more importantly, he was a builder of character, a builder of his people, his community and his family. These were the pillars of his life. He built a world of peace and love."

Speaking of the tumultuous events that paralleled Sharp's life – world wars, the Communist and Islamic revolutions, "a world in turmoil and conflict" – Rabbi Shulman said Sharp's world, "the world he built for himself, his community and his family, was a world filled with love, creativity, energy and Jewish spirit.

"But his most important contribution was reserved for his family, whose lives he filled with genuine love, devotion and affection."

Sharp's son Isadore – Issy to everyone – speaking on behalf of his sisters Edie, Bea and Neddy, paid tribute to "not only our father, but a father figure to many." He spoke of his father's family and the values handed down for 220 years "and now from Max to all of us."

In 1989, Issy, who is the founder, owner, president and CEO of Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts, and his dad were the first father and son Negev Dinner honorees in the Jewish National Fund's history to receive JNF's highest tribute to community leadership and service to others.

Max Sharp

Speaking about his parents at the Negev Dinner, Issy said, "They never talked about ethics. We learned by example, by honesty that was self-evident. Their inheritance to us is the real idealism and ethics they instilled in us as children by the way they lived their lives, [their] values and that we in turn have tried to hand down to our children."

At the JNF dinner, Max said, "The Negev Dinner brings together the two great loves of my life, my family and the State of Israel."

Sharp was born in the Polish town of Oswiecim (Auschwitz in German). He was one of 11 children. At age 18, he went to Palestine as a chalutznik (pioneer) and banayi (builder) and helped establish the first kibbutz, Deganya.

Sharp worked by day planting eucalyptus trees, to dry up the swamps and marshes to prepare for agriculture, and helped defend against Arab raids at night.

In 1925, he immigrated to Canada with a dollar in his pocket, a knapsack on his back and little English. He met Lena (Lil Godfrey) and they were married on June 12, 1927.

He worked as a plasterer for $15 a week, and after asking for a raise, which he didn't get, he began, in 1938, to build houses.

He would move his family into a house, decorate it with the help of his wife and then sell it. His business prospered, his family grew and they established a life of tzedakah, of charitable involvement.

About his parents, Issy said, "Their honeymoon never stopped. Indeed, it was a bond for life – mutual love and respect."

He described his father as a man of "great inner strength. He had a remarkable faculty of understanding and tolerance. He truly bridged the generation gap – to his children, grandchildren and even great-grandchildren."

Sharp was also fondly remembered by his grandchildren Joy Shepherd, Karen Landsberg, Susanne Gottlieb, Tony Sharp, Simone Creed and Wendy Creed. They recalled their "beautiful memories" of their grandmother and grandfather. Shepherd noted that they all learned from "Papa Max that it's nice to be important, but more important to be nice."

Sam Sable, a community leader and a past president of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where he and Sharp worked together for more than half a century, recited K'El Maleh Rachamin, the memorial prayer.

Sable told The CJN, "I was privileged to have Max as a friend for more than half a century. He was a mild-mannered person, a gentleman who had the spirit of his convictions. He was cultured and a person of high morals and integrity.

"He was a man highly respected in the business world and especially in our own community. He generously supported many worthwhile causes in the Jewish community, globally and of course Israel."

He added that his friend enjoyed his hobbies. "He loved walking, playing golf and was a master at needlepoint." Sharp was renowned for hitting a hole in one at age 90.

"He loved to sing and on the dance floor, he could have danced all night," Sable said. "He has left a wonderful legacy to his children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren and to klal Yisrael. We will all miss him."

Sharp is survived by 77 family members, including four children and their spouses – Edie and Eddie Creed, Bea and Fred Eisen, Isadore and Rosalie Sharp, and Nancy and Siggy Levy – 30 grandchildren and 39 great-grandchildren.

Coleman's owner gave many people their start

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jerry Silverberg, owner of Coleman's Deli Restaurant, a landmark at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue, died Nov. 7 at age 58 after a year-long illness.

Silverberg began working at the restaurant as a young teenager shortly after it opened and bought it about 30 years ago. He met his wife Carol when they both worked there while attending high school.

Carol Silverberg said that her husband was a "fixture" in the neighbourhood. "[Hundreds of people] have told me that whenever they drive by, they think of him. [I think] they'll always think of him."

Their daughter Jodi, 23, who is continuing to run the restaurant with her mother, said that over the years, her father gave jobs to a number of youths and to many immigrants who needed their first job in the country.

They always visited after they moved on, she said.

"He provided emotional support for them. They would come in to talk and share a joke. My dad was always able to make people laugh and feel good about themselves."

Although it's rare in the restaurant business, she said, some people he hired have worked at Coleman's for more than 20 years.

Carol said that when her husband was quite ill, he was visited by his uncle, who drove a taxi. "Jerry asked him if he had left the meter running. He had his sense of humour until the end."

Silverberg remained quite positive throughout his illness, his wife said, and always assumed "everything would turn out OK."

When speaking to Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai, where the family were longtime members, Carol said she told him that a lot of people who would be attending the funeral – there turned out to be about 400 – would do so with a smile on their face.

"He touched young people and old people alike, and they laughed just thinking about him."

Businesspeople discuss Canada-Israel trade

By NATALIE RUSKIN
Special to The CJN

The time has come for Canada to "recognize Israel's trading competitiveness on a global scale," said Ephraim Shoham, trade commissioner for Israel, to businesspeople at the first Canada-Israel trade breakfast at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto.

"This event was designed for representatives from the private sector and relevant trade organizations to network and further the development of commerce, trade and investment between Canada and Israel," said Jeffrey Brown, one of the co-ordinators of the event, which was co-sponsored by the Government of Israel Economic Mission to Canada and the Israel Action Committee of BAYT.

Although the speakers joining Shoham all agreed that Israel's trading potential has yet to be fully exploited, views varied as to how Israel should go about expanding trade with Canada.

Israel's innovative industry doesn't get enough exposure, Shoham said, and that's why it's essential to promote events in the Jewish community, where the channels are open for networking.

But Henry Schnurbach, president of Polyair Inc., stressed the importance of marketing Israel's business profitability beyond such Jewish community-oriented trade breakfasts.

He cautioned against the common charity-giving mentality of North American Jews. "Don't give Israeli companies charity… let's give Israel our fair share of business because Israelis are opportunistic and looking for work," he said.

Arnie Recht, representing Technion University, said "the majority of Israeli companies listed on the U.S. stock exchange are Technion grads. Israeli scientists and engineers need the space and funds to develop their projects."

The silver went to Given Imaging Ltd., a Technion incubator company that developed a pill-shaped camera that screens the esophagus for disorders.

Recht was candid about Technion's need for financial support. "There are numerous Technion projects looking for funding," he said, "and you can support Technion students and profs by contributing charitably to the Technion society."

There are some Canada-Israel trade developments in the works.

Shoham is discussing, with Canadian Olympic officials, about their purchasing Israeli security products and communication services for the 2010 Olympics in Vancouver.

Shoham, in partnership with Monte Kwinter, Ontario's Minister of Safety and Correctional Services, has organized a delegation of some 30-35 Ontario police chiefs to visit Israel. He described the visit as an opportunity to promote Israeli security services and technology products.

Plans are also being made for 15 Israeli technology companies to visit Canada and discuss security options for port authorities and banks.

POLISH HONOURS: Three prominent members of the Jewish community gathered at Toronto's Polish consulate recently, where they were awarded the Order of Merit of the Republic of Poland for fostering Polish-Jewish relations through the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation. From left are Nathan Leipciger, Polish Consul General Piotr Konowrocki, Frank Bialystok and Henry Dasko. Also honoured was Rabbi Dow Marmur, who was out of the country. The foundation, established in 1987, is dedicated to promoting the history and culture of Polish Jewry and to examining Polish-Jewish relations.

REENA PHONE-A-THON: Volunteers Anna Vendrov and Alex Aptekman took part last month in Reena's first-ever fall phone-a-thon. The Nov. 22-24 event took place at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre and raised more than $15,000 for Reena's respite and enrichment programs.

Mugesera allegation rejected

The Supreme Court of Canada last week dismissed a motion by Quebec City lawyer Guy Bertrand to halt proceedings against his client, former Rwandan political activist Leon Mugesera, because Justice Minister Irwin Cotler and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) allegedly conspired in appointing Justice Rosalie Abella in order to influence the outcome of the deportation case.

The court permitted Bertrand to present his argument that Cotler, his friends Abella and her husband Irving Abella, and CJC, which is an intervenor in the case, are closely associated and have a common interest in wanting Mugesera, who has been accused of inciting genocide in Rwanda, out of the country.

The court did not ask any questions after Bertrand presented his theory on Dec. 8, nor did it ask the Crown to respond. Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin said the reasons for throwing out the motion would follow, but she did not indicate when.

The court then went ahead with hearing the federal government's appeal of a Federal Court of Canada decision last year overturning the deportation of Mugesera. The Federal Court said the government had not proved the hate crime allegations against Mugesera.

Bertrand argued in the Supreme Court that Cotler, CJC and Abella's husband Irving, like Cotler, a past CJC president, "abused their power and perverted the justice system to their own personal ends... It seems that justice is being organized by powerful people who have influence behind the scenes. It is as if there were a parallel justice system."

Abella, who was appointed to the Supreme Court in August, recused herself from the case well before Bertrand launched his motion last month.

AJC holds biennial conference

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Re-elected Atlantic Jewish Council president Mark Rosen has promised to "turn the organization back to the communities, to ensure we are bringing them programming from themselves forward, to enable them to develop their own programming to suit their needs."

Speaking at the recent AJC biennial conference in Halifax, Rosen said the next two years will be dedicated to working more effectively with communities and giving them what they need.

"It's not an easy task," he said. "We have a small office which tries to reach out to a large region. We get lots of requests and we try to do what we can, but we can't be all things to all people. We have to focus on what we do well."

That includes fundraising, education – specifically Holocaust education – and involvement in national programs, he said.

"There are a number of us [on the AJC management committee and board, and in the communities] who are on national boards," he continued. "That ensures we have a voice, that we are taken seriously and that there's a real partnership with the national bodies and the AJC. It's important we stay involved nationally, because that's an important part of our agenda."

Turning his attention again to the communities within the region, Rosen stressed the roles of community representatives will be enlarged by redefining them. "We want to be more project-oriented, and this means enlarging the volunteer base in the communities."

He added, "There is a dire dearth of leadership in the small communities. We can't rely on the same group [of people] year after year. We need a base for the future."

The convention also featured discussion and panel groups on such topics as how to work for Israel from Atlantic Canada, anti-Semitism in the region, and combating anti-Israel feelings in small communities.

The Shabbat dinner kick-off event featured Toronto's Judy Feld Carr speaking passionately about her clandestine efforts to free 3,200 Syrian Jews between 1977 and 2001.

The late Inge Blackett of Prince Edward Island was recognized for her active participation in that province's small Jewish community. A Holocaust survivor, she was president of the P.E.I. Jewish community in 2001, participated in all Jewish community activities, and was involved in many general community groups. She was also largely responsible for the P.E.I. legislature being the first in Canada to enact a law recognizing Holocaust Memorial Day.

Evelyn Drucker of Sydney, N.S., was noted for establishing the first occupational therapy department in Cape Breton. After visiting Dachau concentration camp in 1962, she threw herself into Jewish activities. She became a devoted member of Hadassah and chapter president, and was president of her synagogue sisterhood. She has also spearheaded the development of Holocaust education in the Cape Breton school system.

Leona Freeman of Halifax was honoured for a long career in volunteer work for Jewish causes. She taught Sunday school at Beth Israel Synagogue as a newly married woman in the 1950s. Hadassah has been her passion since the late 1940s, and she has served her Halifax chapter as president, later becoming regional chair for Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. She is still a national executive member. Freeman is also involved in non-Jewish organizations such as the Art Gallery of Nova Scotia and the Nova Scotia Association of Health Care Authorities.

Marilyn Kaufman of Fredericton is a life member of Hadassah-WIZO, and she has served in many roles with her chapter and as a national vice-president and board member. A past president of her synagogue, Marilyn is an elementary school teacher who has been active in many community and education groups.

New Counselling Choices at Bernard Betel Centre

In October, The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living collaborated with Dr. Ami Rokach of York University and Lori Dennis, a psychotherapist in private practice, to open The Healing Centre, offering a full range of counselling services for adults 55+.

For seniors, seeking help 'a sign of strength,' therapist says

Members can take advantage of five professional therapists through individual sessions and support groups for women, Holocaust survivors, and others – all free with Betel Centre membership.

Co-founder Lori Dennis speaks about how The Healing Centre can enhance the mental and emotional well-being of older adults:

What is the goal of The Healing Centre?

Seniors are looking for the same things as everybody else: a sense of belonging, to be heard, a chance to feel cared for.

At this stage, it's even more important to make meaning of their lives, make connections, deal with forgiveness, or other issues that may have been haunting them. We help people put these things to rest.

Sometimes, people just want to talk; they feel dismissed by society. Among other things, The Healing Centre offers a safe, confidential place for people to say whatever they want to say.

Challenges such as bereavement, loneliness, stress, depression, anxiety can affect anybody, at any age, but they may affect seniors more because they've had more life to live. If you're 82, you've probably have had more losses than if you're 22. Losses do accumulate and become more difficult to deal with if not faced. Some people also struggle with abusive relationships past and present.

Seniors are also often dealing with physical problems, medications and chronic pain. All of this is very stressful, which can be helped through counselling.

Do seniors hesitate to ask for help with these issues?

There is a tremendous need for education about counselling. For older people, there may still be negative associations or shame associated with therapy. But it's not a sign of weakness; rather, seeking counselling is a sign of strength.

In counselling, we do not offer advice, we are actually partners in healing. It's not our job to tell them what to do. We put ourselves in the client's shoes and help them see themselves, others, and the world more clearly.

It takes courage to come see us; it's our privilege to help them address their issues. And anybody, at any age, can use the opportunity to understand themselves better.

What are some signs that a friend or family member might benefit from this type of help?

If you feel a person's behaviour has changed; they're not sleeping well or eating properly, their moods seem consistently low, or they're not willing to participate in life the way they once did, it could be a sign of depression or unwillingness to connect with others. If they've lost a loved one or spouse, grief isn't something which just goes away, it has to be faced, when they're ready. People say time can heal, but only with effort can we get past the grief and learn to cope with the pain.

How does The Healing Centre serve the Betel Centre's mission of "maximizing the quality of life for seniors in the community"?

It's part of the whole idea of improving one's health: mind, body, spirit. Members come to exercise their bodies or attend religious services; they also need to think about mental and emotional health.

The Betel Centre is a busy place; people enjoy being there. There's something for everyone… music, nutrition services, the Computer Learning & Resource Centre – talk about keeping their minds sharp! It's very impressive.

The Betel Centre is a unique centre, and The Healing Centre is a unique service. There aren't many agencies that offer professional psychotherapy services at no charge. Our dedicated counsellors feel privileged to give their time and professional skills to help this population.

Members of the Betel Centre can leave a message on The Healing Centre's confidential voicemail by calling (416) 225-2112, Ext. 112. We pick up messages daily, and a counsellor will call back to set up a first meeting.

Firebombed library reopens in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The contrast could not be greater between the devastation discovered in the early morning hours of a snowy April morning at the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs (UTT) and the rebuilt library that was inaugurated last week.

What was a black, wet cavern eight months ago has been transformed into a bright, welcoming oasis for the 219 elementary school children. The new library was made possible by the donations, big and small, that poured in from Canada and beyond after the school was firebombed on the eve of Passover. It is bigger and better-equipped than the one that was lost.

The atmosphere at the school has also changed, officials say. The reopening of the library is viewed as a new chapter in the school's history and a chance to show the students that good has triumphed over a hateful crime. Although guards and other new security measures have become a fact of life at UTT, the children have also learned that many people, some living in other countries, care about them, said UTT director-general Sidney Benudiz.

Principal Soly Benamron said, "We feel empowered because we have taken back what they [the perpetrators] took from us."

The inauguration took place on the first night of Chanukah, before politicians, including Education Minister Pierre Reid, Jewish leaders, Israeli Consul General Marc Attali, supporters and the school community. Two mounted Montreal police officers stood sentinel at the school's front door.

The choice of date was appropriate, several speakers noted, because this is a holiday that celebrates the Jewish people's triumph over adversity. The ceremony was also a show of appreciation. The school received about 13,000 books, more than $400,000 in donations and thousands of messages from every province, the United States, Europe and Israel, and from every major religious group. UTT is not disclosing the cost of the rebuilding until its insurance claim is finalized.

"This outpouring of support, volunteer assistance and financial contributions certainly helped strengthen the school community, helping us cope and move forward through this most trying time," said UTT president Rachel Cohen.

"A critical lesson learned by everyone at UTT is that, this time, the world was not quiet when we were attacked. Unlike many of our students' grandparents who went through the Holocaust, this time, the world reached out to us and helped all of us heal."

Approximately 15,000 books were lost, as well as the computers. The remnants and ashes of some 250 books containing the name of God were buried in the Kehal Yisrael cemetery in Dollard des Ormeaux and a headstone placed on the site the week before the inauguration.

UTT kept 8,000 of the donated books, mainly English fiction, and has purchased 5,000 more books to restock the new shelves. Many of the others went to the other UTT or Herzliah High School. The cataloguing of the new collection was done voluntarily by librarians, while parents and others gave their time to cover the books.

The new library, which is about 25 per cent larger, also has four computers and an audio-visual area. The lobby of the school, where the library is located, has also been reconfigured to allow the office to better monitor the front entrance. Part of the donations are going toward the increased security measures.

The principal donor was the Azrieli Family Foundation, and the library is dedicated to Stephanie Azrieli, who was the librarian at the school from 1975-85.

Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman delivered a statement on behalf of Premier Jean Charest, saying that "the whole of Quebec society was outraged by this despicable crime… and attack on the intrinsic values of Quebec."

The entire student body were scheduled to hold their own assembly earlier this week to express their gratitude to everyone. A tribute to police and fire department representatives was planned as part of the program.

Sleiman Elmerhabi, 19, who is charged with the UTT firebombing and has been detained since his arrest in May, is scheduled to appear in court Dec. 16. His mother, Rouba Fahd-Elmerhabi is also charged with being an accessory after the fact.

Charges of arson and conspiracy against a third man arrested at the same time, Simon Zogheib, 19, were dropped in October.

NOTICE OF POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF RIVERDALE SHUL (DANFORTH)

The Riverdale Shul, founded in 1994 by Toronto filmmaker, Simcha Jacobovici, is home to about 120 people. It's a warm, informal Orthodox synagogue which fills an important need to an estimated 5,000 unaffiliated Jews in the Danforth area, some of whom are among the poorest and troubled in our community.

The shul hosted activities six days a week, including cheder, bar mitzvah and ethics/mussar programs as well as classes for adults in Hebrew conversation and shiurim with Rabbi Avraham Kubayov. This year it cannot hold a Chanukah party.

In order to survive, the shul requires immediate and long-term, stable funding from the wider Jewish Community, as well as assistance with its administration. It also needs a Board of Directors made up of individuals who are business-oriented and interested in seeing the shul grow.

A public meeting has been called to explore all possibilities to avert a closure. The meeting will be held on Tuesday, December 21st at 7 p.m. at the shul – 179A Danforth Avenue, 2nd floor (just east of Broadview Avenue). We urge you to attend this meeting. For more information, please call 416-826-4539.

Rabbis for Same-Sex Marriage also said it is confident that religious communities will not be forced to officiate at, host, or recognize same-sex weddings if they go against religious beliefs, scriptural references and congregational policies.

But Rabbi David Novak, a vocal opponent of same-sex marriage who teaches Jewish studies at the University of Toronto, said that despite the court's assurances, he does not believe that religious groups or individual clergy will be completely protected if they refuse to bless homosexual unions.

He predicted that Jewish gays will one day choose a rabbi who will refuse to conduct their marriage ceremony "on purpose [in order] to challenge the law. What happens when a rabbi is brought up on charges of discrimination?"

While he applauded the court for referring the issue back to Parliament, he called the government's proposed same-sex legislation "disgraceful," and he criticized Cotler, who "is not the least influenced by his Jewish tradition, which indicates that marriage is between a man and a woman."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas said the court's finding "is not going to make a major dent" among rabbis who are opposed to same-sex marriage.

"For rabbis who are committed to Jewish tradition as handed down, this is not going to change anything because they didn't do it before and they aren't going to do it now."

He said there are "more pressing" problems for Jews, such as marriage breakdown, Jews living in common-law relationships and infidelity.

Rabbi Bulka said he would refuse to officiate at a same-sex ceremony, "but gently and kindly, not because of discrimination. I have no mandate in Jewish law to do so. I've been asked on many occasions to marry a Jew and a non-Jew, and I don't do that either."

Rabbi David Mivasair of Vancouver's Congregation Ahavat Olam, who has conducted several same-sex marriage ceremonies, including one between a rabbi and a cantor, said he was "pleased" by the court's opinion.

"The Jewish idea of marriage is kiddushin – sanctity or holiness. It's not about procreation and never has been."

Rabbi Ronnie Cahane, president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, welcomed the court's stance. "I'm pleased the court recognizes that everybody's relationships in society should be honoured."

However, he too said he would refuse to perform a same-sex wedding.

"Laws in Judaism have different standards than [those] in a secular society," he said.

Quebec day schools get major funding boost

The federation negotiated the new funding arrangement, along with the Association of Jewish Day Schools and the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre, both federation agencies.

The 15 school corporations, with about 7,000 students, last year received $21 million a year from the government, Freedman said. The government expenditure will increase to $35 million a year.

Each school corporation will decide whether to sign onto the new arrangement and can choose the school board it wants to associate with, Freedman said. He is confident most will, including at least some of the chassidic and other Orthodox schools.

The Jewish schools will not lose their autonomy, but their association with the school boards will require co-operation in the organization of student and teacher exchanges, and joint activities, such as arts festivals, public-speaking contests and field trips, a point stressed by Reid. The boards and their associated Jewish schools will have to submit an annual report on their progress in pursuing intercultural exchange.

Reid made the announcement at the inauguration of the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs library. At the same event, federation president Sylvain Abitbol said, "The payoff for society will be phenomenal. Teaching tolerance is as much a part of education as reading, writing and mathematics."

The school boards gain by associate status because it is "pedagogically sound to expose their students to other cultures," Freedman said, adding that the 10 per cent share is another incentive.

Freedman emphasized that the exact nature of the relationship between any Jewish school and the school board will be worked out between them, according to the government's guidelines, which he said are quite broad.

He said the education ministry has a policy of promoting integration and rapprochement among students of different cultural backgrounds and, through associate status, the day school students will become "ambassadors of the Jewish heritage" to the greater community. At the same time, Jewish students will be exposed to non-Jewish society.

Those schools that do not associate with a school board at this time may be able to do so at a later date, Freedman said.

The federation currently allocates $2.5 million to subsidize tuitions for students whose parents cannot pay. Freedman said the federation will continue to put that amount into Jewish education, but it will not be designated for tuition assistance.

It will be up to each school to decide how to accommodate needy children, he said.

"Our principle remains that no Jewish child should be denied a Jewish education, and the schools will be encouraged to be accessible," he said.

"We are just starting discussions with the schools on setting principles and benchmarks to ensure equity and uniformity across the system."

The federation also remains committed to spending $3 million on security for all the schools, and any extra costs to the schools in this area should be minimal, he said.

The full funding of the Jewish schools' secular studies is actually the fulfilment of a decade-old promise, Freedman noted.

During the 1994 provincial election, then education minister Jacques Chagnon announced at a press conference at Hebrew Academy that, if the Liberals were re-elected, his government would approve associate status for the Jewish schools with the now-defunct Montreal Catholic School Commission.

The Liberals lost and remained out of power until April 2003. The Catholic board disappeared when the province's public school boards were reorganized according to language rather than religion.

Government funding of public schools is on a per-student basis, with the rates varying according to grade level.

Freedman also noted that there is a precedent for this level of government funding of a community-based private school. The Greek community's Socrates School, with 1,250 students, has had associate status with a public board for many years.

Some Jewish schools had associate status with the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal starting in the late 1960s. They went back to being completely independent when the government set its funding of general studies at about 80 per cent. The rate began to erode in the late 1970s, after the Parti Québécois was elected.

Quebec has traditionally funded private schools more generously than most provinces, and private education is generally gaining in popularity in the province.

Hyperventilation over UN 'shift'

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian government recently decided to adjust its vote on United Nations resolutions that affect Israel. The result: Canada voted against two resolutions on which it had previously abstained, and it voted for a resolution on which it had also previously abstained. It was nothing earth-shattering, but it was enough to get the media's attention.

On CBC's The National (Dec. 3), Eric Sorensen accurately captured the essence of Canada's decision: "Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew says Canada has not made a fundamental shift in Canadian policy, though he suggests this country does want to play a role in a post-Arafat Middle East, and that may require that Canada not always vote with the crowd."

Others who got it right included Shira Herzog ("There's more to Mideast policy than how we vote at the UN," Globe and Mail, Dec. 3) and the CJN editorial "Too soon to see a change" (Dec. 9).

Still, other media analysts overreacted.

John Ibbitson's Globe and Mail column, "In case you missed it, our Mideast policy has shifted," (Dec. 3) argued, as the headline suggested, that "Canada significantly shifted its Mideast policy." Confusing core Mideast policy with minor changes at the United Nations, Ibbitson failed to substantiate his claim of a policy shift, let alone a significant one.

Ibbitson speculated that lobbying efforts by "the powerful new Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy" helped shape this change. Ibbitson also displayed a peculiar understanding of the traditional motivation behind Canada's UN vote: "Although these [UN] votes were clearly biased against Israel, Canada [traditionally] joined with Europe and the developing world in supporting them or at most, abstaining, because the resolutions are seen as one of the few forums through which the Palestinians can make their voices heard."

This theory is nonsense. Former Canadian diplomats have admitted it was simply easier to line up with Europe against the United States on votes involving Israel. The Jewish state became a convenient sacrificial lamb to alliances and international politics.

Having advanced his "significant policy shift" argument, Ibbitson concluded by contradicting himself: "The [UN] votes are more symbol than substance. The fundamentals of Canada's balanced approach to the Middle East remain intact."

Not voting with the UN's anti-Israel crowd appears to have badly irked Toronto Star columnist Linda McQuaig ("Canada missteps at UN," Dec. 5). Objecting to Canada's "policy shift," McQuaig misrepresented Canada's UN ambassador, Allan Rock, as trying to downplay the move by "complaining that the UN passes too many resolutions about Palestinian rights."

That's not what Rock said. Had McQuaig read Rock's Nov. 30 address to the UN General Assembly, she would have known that in reiterating Canada's "fundamental principles" on the Middle East, Rock emphasized this country's concern with Palestinian human rights.

McQuaig twisted the truth by portraying Israelis as rapacious and oppressive, and the Palestinians – along with the rest of the Arab world – as weak innocents with no resources beyond the United Nations: "So the power balance – in Israel's favour – is extreme. The Arab and Muslim nations of the world, with the support of other developing countries, have used their numbers in the UN General Assembly to try, in some small way, to redress this imbalance. Being otherwise powerless, they pass resolutions, hoping to at least keep the Palestinian issue alive in world debate."

The United Nations, in fact, has been used by the Palestinians and the wider Arab world to isolate and delegitimize Israel. Israel is cast in the most vile light imaginable, most often to the delight of the majority crowd.

This ganging up on Israel is a clear manifestation of the dysfunction at the UN, which Canada is now committed to ending. Others would be well advised to join this vital exercise in UN reform.

Five soldiers killed in Rafah tunnel attack

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Five Israeli soldiers were killed and at least six wounded in the Gaza Strip Sunday when a booby-trapped tunnel blew up under an army outpost near Rafah.

The soldiers, who were all from the Bedouin reconnaissance battalion, killed one armed Palestinian who participated in the assault.

Hamas and a Fatah faction, the Fatah Hawks, claimed joint responsibility for the attack, the most lethal of its kind since the start of the conflict.

Government and defence sources said Israel would respond to the attack, but in a "measured" fashion that would not involve a large-scale ground operation. On one hand, they explained, Israel wants to be "very careful" in the run-up to January's elections in the Palestinian Authority and the disengagement from Gaza, but on the other, it does not want to return to a policy of restraint in the face of attacks.

The sources said the response would probably not include a freeze on the planned release of up to 200 Palestinian prisoners. However, closure of the Rafah border crossing for an extended period is a possibility. That would be a severe blow to Gaza residents, since with the area's ports and airports closed, Rafah is their only gateway to the outside world.

The attack began at about 5:30 p.m., when a bomb went off under the outpost, located some 200 metres east of the Rafah crossing. The explosion, which destroyed the eastern part of the outpost, killed two soldiers, buried a third under the rubble and caused most of the injuries. The third soldier was later reported dead.

Immediately afterward, two armed Palestinians penetrated the outpost from the west and opened fire, killing two more soldiers. Israeli soldiers returned fire, killing one of the Palestinians, a Fatah operative. His companion, a Hamas operative, escaped, but was reportedly wounded. Hamas said he escaped with a weapon belonging to one of the soldiers.

Later, another bomb went off near an armoured personnel carrier parked near the outpost, but caused no casualties.

The wounded soldiers were evacuated to Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva, and rescue crews were brought in to start digging for the soldier buried under the rubble. The digging went on well into the night, under constant Palestinian fire. Helicopter gunships and other troops were sent in to provide cover for the rescue workers.

Hamas told the Palestinian media the tunnel under the outpost was some 250 metres long, and about 1.5 tons of explosives were used to blow it up. The Israel Defence Forces' preliminary investigation confirmed these claims.

Hamas also said preparations for the attack took about four months – which undermines its claim that the operation was to avenge "the killing of the commander and symbol, Yasser Arafat."

The tunnel originated in the agricultural land east of Rafah – an area where the IDF has conducted extensive operations, including tearing up trees and bushes, in an effort to prevent the digging of tunnels. Dozens of people were apparently involved in preparing the attack, which reflected a high level of planning and sophistication, IDF sources said.

The fact that the tunnel was dug over the course of four months without being discovered was a serious intelligence failure, the sources admitted. They said there is still a "black hole" in Israeli intelligence with regard to tunnel attacks.

Another lapse uncovered by the preliminary inquiry into the incident was the failure of the outpost's lookouts to spot the two Palestinian gunmen, who had managed to get close to the outpost even before the explosion.

A senior officer on the IDF general staff told Ha'aretz that Hamas appears to have begun a new offensive in Gaza over the past week. This has included the resumption of Qassam launches into Israel, though in limited quantities, and heavy mortar fire on the Gush Katif settlements. The IDF believes Hamas wants to provoke a massive Israeli response to foil the efforts by new Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas to calm the violence. In addition, IDF sources said, Hamas wants public support in the run-up to January's elections, even though it is not fielding a candidate.

There were also several other incidents in the Gaza Strip on Sunday. A Qassam rocket fired from northern Gaza landed in an Israeli community inside the Green Line, damaging a car but causing no casualties. In addition, several mortar shells – 12, according to the settlers – were fired at Gaza settlements, but also caused no casualties.

Sharon and Peres talk unity

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — With an eye toward withdrawing Israel from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Labor party leader Shimon Peres, lifelong friends and career rivals, are back at their old game of government building.

Negotiators for Sharon and opposition leader Peres met Sunday for what looked to be a very short round of talks on forging a unity coalition. Their respective parties approved the union last week.

The Labor party did not make specific demands for cabinet posts in agreeing to support Sharon, who recently lost his parliamentary majority.

"Let's be clear on this: there will be a government," Labor's Haim Ramon told Army Radio. "The question is whether we join this government with significant cabinet portfolios, or without."

Under Peres, Labor has set a high premium on helping Sharon push through his plan to withdraw Israeli troops and settlers from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank next year.

While media reports suggest Peres could be rewarded with a tailor-made post in the next Sharon government – that of "disengagement minister" – the Labor leader has made no mention of any such payback.

"We expect to see a deal within days," he told reporters last weekend.

But Sharon also needs help passing the battered 2005 budget, which his previous coalition partner, the secular Shinui party, blocked in the Knesset on Dec. 1, in protest against funding earmarked for religious causes.

Sharon fired Shinui and now is courting the Orthodox Shas party as a possible third member of a Likud- and Labor-led government.

Meantime, Israel has been tacitly encouraging the campaign to find a successor to Yasser Arafat in Palestinian elections slated for Jan. 9.

On Sunday, the cabinet approved in principle the release of as many as 200 Palestinian security prisoners, if they were not serving sentences for terrorist attacks that killed or seriously hurt Israelis.

Jerusalem officials described the measure as part of a reciprocal arrangement with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, after he granted accused Israeli spy Azzam Azzam an early release from prison last week.

But they also acknowledged that the releases could boost the prestige of Palestinian presidential frontrunner Mahmoud Abbas in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"It never hurts for the Palestinian moderates to be perceived as making gains from Israel. But as far as we are concerned, the real test is in whether they can stop the terrorism," a Jerusalem official said.

PA may receive security responsibility before pullout

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel may consider giving the Palestinian Authority security responsibility for the territories before its planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the northern West Bank, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Monday.

"I am prepared to transfer responsibility in the Gaza Strip even before implementation of the pullout plan… and more so, on the day the Palestinians will be ready to take responsibility over cities in the West Bank, I am convinced we must transfer authority in these places before, or during the pullout, but only if they stop the terror that is coming out of Jenin and Nablus," Mofaz said at the Herzliyah Conference.

Mofaz also said that Israel Defence Forces troops will be pulled out of Palestinian cities ahead of the Jan. 9 elections in the Palestinian Authority.

"We will leave the Palestinian cities for a period of about 72 hours, that is the day before, the day of and the day after the election," Mofaz said.

"We will do our best not to interfere with orderly procedure of the election," he added.

Mofaz's speech was the first time that Israel has provided details on how it will make good on its promise to facilitate the vote.

But Palestinian cabinet minister Saeb Erekat said IDF troops should withdraw from Palestinian towns immediately to enable candidates to campaign. Israel should also lift travel bans on Palestinians and remove checkpoints, Erekat said.

Yuschenko visits Kiev synagogue as re-vote nears

By VLADIMIR MATVEYEV
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

KIEV — In the run-up to Ukraine's presidential re-vote, opposition candidate Viktor Yuschenko is taking steps to dispel fears among some Jews stemming from his political ties with Ukrainian nationalist groups. On Dec. 9, Yuschenko made a public appearance in Kiev's Central Synagogue to light Chanukah candles.

Some 400 Jews packed the shul, known here as the Brodsky Synagogue, welcoming Yuschenko and his wife Katerina, along with two of the couple's five children with an ovation.

In an interview with JTA that evening, Yuschenko – who has been suffering from a mystery ailment that reports now indicate was the result of a deliberate poisoning – said that should he win the upcoming election, slated for Dec. 26, he will make relations with Israel a priority.

"Under my presidency, the relations between Ukraine and the State of Israel will take a turn for the better," Yuschenko told JTA.

Some leaders of Ukraine's Jewish community, who had previously preferred not to publicize their political preferences during the election standoff that followed the contested Nov. 21 presidential runoff, praised Yuschenko for his public show of support to the community.

"This visit demonstrated Yuschenko's human and political position and his respect toward the Jewish community," said Eduard Dolinsky, executive director of the umbrella United Jewish Community of Ukraine.

Yuschenko is widely expected to win in the re-vote later this month in which he is slated to again face Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovich, who is supported by the central authorities in this nation of 48 million.

The results of the Nov. 21 runoff – in which Yuschenko finished second to Yanukovich – were invalidated by Ukraine's Supreme Court earlier this month due to allegations of widespread electoral fraud.

Jews were among thousands of Ukrainians who flocked to Kiev's central square in the aftermath of the Nov. 21 runoff to protest what they believed were tainted election results.

Many Jewish voters had said they supported Yanukovich because they feared the anti-Semitism associated with some nationalist groups that are members of Yuschenko's coalition.

Yuschenko's Chanukah appearance is likely to allay some of these concerns and could influence the Jewish vote in the upcoming election, some Jewish experts believe.

"Some Jews have apprehensions about Yuschenko's entourage, but his visit dispelled much of the fears," said Mikhail Frenkel, a veteran Jewish journalist in Kiev and head of the Association of Jewish Media in Ukraine.

Jews who greeted Yuschenko in the shul last week were not shy about whom they supported. Many wore orange ribbons and scarves – orange being the symbol of Yuschenko's campaign – in addition to badges reading, "Yes, Yuschenko!"

For his part, Yuschenko sported a kippah, which Jewish officials said was a first among top Ukrainian political leaders.

The Jewish community of Kiev said it sent Chanukah invitations to both presidential contenders, but only Yuschenko responded. Community leaders said they did not know if Yanukovich intended to visit the synagogue during the holiday.

In his short address at the synagogue, Yuschenko said that Chanukah "demonstrates that nothing can prevent people from moving to freedom."

He also spoke highly of the Jewish people and Israel.

"This was the great Jewish people who saved Jewish traditions, culture and revived the Jewish state," he said.

He noted similarities between Israel and his own country's movement for independence – a movement that many here believe has taken a step forward with the pro-opposition protests dubbed the "Orange Revolution."

"Many pages of the history of Ukraine and the State of Israel are very similar," Yuschenko said.

Yuschenko and his family were treated to some traditional Chanukah specialties at the shul, including latkes and jelly donuts, and his wife conversed with Yael Azman, the wife of the shul's rabbi, Moshe Reuven Azman, throughout most of the visit.

"We should respect the diversity of our world with different voices," Yuschenko told the synagogue audience, adding that as president he will "always support different nationalities living in Ukraine."

Responding to a question from JTA about the prospects of the restitution of former Jewish communal property – one of the most pressing issues for Ukraine's Jewish community – Yuschenko said he will be guided by justice in dealing with the issue.

"Justice should be the dominant question in the issue of restitution of Jewish property," he said. "The property must be returned to the owner."

School raid shocks Venezuelan Jews

By JULIE DRUCKER
Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles

LOS ANGELES – None of the 1,500 children at the only Jewish day school in Caracas, Venezuela, will forget drop-off on the morning of Nov. 29.

That day, 25 government investigators, some of them armed and hooded, intercepted busloads of kids and turned them away.

Panicked parents whose kids were already inside the school tried desperately to gain access. Some two dozen kids were locked inside, preschoolers in one room and older children in another. Not knowing whether this was a hostage crisis, parents pleaded for their children's return. Over the next hour, the investigators let all the children out, unharmed.

But search teams stayed for three hours, and, aside from the incident with the children, they were courteous and respectful. School officials said the teams took nothing and left offices and classrooms undisturbed. Upon finishing, they declared that the search of the Centro Social, Cultural y Deportivo Hebraica was "unfruitful."

The search took place in connection with the murder of prosecutor Danilo Anderson, who was assassinated in his car by a remote bomb planted in his cellphone. Anderson was investigating several politically sensitive cases, namely the prosecution of key members of the opposition to President Hugo Chavez in an attempted coup in 2002.

Prosecutors had received a tip about the transfer of weapons and explosives from Club Magnum, a shooting club, to the Jewish school. Club Magnum was not searched.

Community leaders and international Jewish organizations immediately denounced the raid and expressed outrage.

In a press release to South American papers, the Simon Wiesenthal Center described the incident as an "anti-Semitic act, more like a pogrom than a judicial proceeding," and demanded the immediate suspension of Venezuela's incorporation into Mercosur, the South American Trade Association.

Local indignation was just as strong. In a letter to El Nacional, one of Venezuela's main newspapers, Pinchas Brenner, chief rabbi of Venezuela, denounced the raid. He said it showed an "astute economy of intimidation," since "there is not a single Jewish family in Caracas that was not affected. Many of us have children in the school, grandchildren, great-grandchildren – or friends. An attack on the school is the most effective way of jolting the entire Jewish population."

Although local papers carried incensed commentary from Jewish groups, official community statements omitted accusations of anti-Semitism.

Why such an apolitical cultural and community centre would be targeted is a mystery to the Jewish community, which has always adopted a stance of "live and let live" and has deliberately kept a low profile in political issues.

But in the days preceding the raid, the media ran independent, non-government-sponsored opinion pieces that compared the style of Anderson's assassination to targeted killings of terror suspects by Israel.

The commentary led to a press release by the Israeli Embassy in Caracas, aired by TV stations, condemning Anderson's murder and stating it had no connection to it.

Most community leaders agree that, aside from isolated incidents, there is little anti-Semitism in Venezuela. Daniel Slimak, head of the umbrella organization of major Jewish groups, noted that "neither the president nor any high-ranking member of his administration has ever uttered a single word against the community."

Slimak added that, when necessary, the community has sought and obtained government protection – such as additional security on the High Holy Days.

But others present a bleaker picture. In a section on Venezuela in its 2002/3 Anti-Semitism Worldwide Report, the Stephen Roth Institute of Tel Aviv reported, "a great deal of virulent anti-Semitic propaganda, including classical manifestations of anti-Semitism."

The report said that after the unsuccessful 2002 coup against Chavez, unfounded theories circulated in the independent media about involvement of the CIA and the Mossad.

Egypt, Israel to co-operate

Israel and Egypt are launching joint strategic initiatives, Israeli defence minister Shaul Mofaz said last week. They will include Egypt's deployment of forces along its Gaza border and security co-operation against terror. The statement came a day after Egypt released an alleged Israeli Druze spy in exchange for six Egyptians caught sneaking into Israel and accused of planning terror attacks.

Ayalon joins Labor

Ami Ayalon, an Israeli security chief turned grassroots peacemaker, joined the Labor Party last week, saying he supports Labor's backing of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement plan, and that he won't challenge Shimon Peres for the Labor leadership. Ayalon, a former Shin Bet chief, heads the People's Voice peace group with Palestinian academic Sari Nusseibeh. Analysts say he could serve in cabinet if Labor joins Sharon's coalition.

Profs accept Nobel Prize

Technion professors Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover, the first Israelis to win Nobel Prizes in chemistry, accepted their awards, together with U.S. scientist Irwin Rose, in Stockholm last week. They were honoured for their 1980s research into regulated protein degradation, which expanded the understanding of cancer. Speaking to reporters before leaving for Sweden, they criticized declining funding for Israel's education system, saying neglecting education is like national suicide.

Palestinians oppose attacks

A poll by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center found that for the first time since the start of the intifadah in September 2000, most Palestinians, some 52 per cent, oppose violence against Israel and believe it is counterproductive to the Palestinian national interest. The figure is up sharply since June, when opposition to attacks on Israeli targets – including soldiers in the territories – stood at only 27 per cent. A majority, 57 per cent, favour a two-state solution, while 24 per cent support the creation of a binational state. Only 12 per cent favour an Islamic state between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea.

Settler jailed for terror

An Israeli court sentenced West Bank settler Shachar Zelinger-Dvir to eight years in jail in connection with roadside ambushes that have killed several Palestinians since 2001. Investigators called him and fellow suspects the "Jewish underground."

Stocks hit record high

The Tel Aviv Maof stock index hit 593 points, an all-time high, during intra-day trading last week, beating an August 2000 record. Traders credited strong world markets and speculation the Labor Party will soon join a national unity government. Other factors were Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's death, Syrian calls for peace talks and Egypt's release of accused spy Azzam Azzam.

Court ruling seen as a blow to terror supporters

By DANIEL I. DORFMAN AND LISA PEVTZOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CHICAGO — Leaders of Chicago's Jewish community are optimistic that a jury award of $156 million to an Israeli-American family whose son was killed in the West Bank will send a stern message that financial support of terrorist organizations won't be tolerated.

A jury ruled last week in a Chicago federal courthouse that three Chicago-based Islamic organizations and one individual must pay the Boim family $156 million in damages for the 1996 murder of their son David, 17.

The jury found the Quranic Literacy Institute (QLI) guilty. U.S. Magistrate Arlander Keys previously had found three other parties – the Islamic Association for Palestine, the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, and an individual named Muhammad Salah – liable.

"I think the precedent is enormous," said Michael Kotzin, executive vice- president of the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago. "I think if nothing else, any other organizations that are doing this thing hopefully will stop altogether. If not, they will be a lot more careful.

"We're fighting a war against terrorism, and one of the ways to fight it is to dry up a source of funds, to be ready to identify the supporters, and that has happened."

Attorney Minda Block, the local Jewish Community Relations Council's domestic affairs associate, noted that the case marked the first time the Federal Anti-Terrorism Act had been used to go after U.S.-based charities that fund terrorism.

As the verdict was announced, Joyce Boim nodded her head as if to signal her approval. Her son, David, had hoped to become a doctor, and the trial included testimony about the potential value of David's life if he had lived to achieve his dream.

"Maybe it's a drop in the bucket with the entire Hamas organization, but at least we have stopped some money used to buy bombs and bullets that blow up children," Joyce Boim said.

The QLI did not pursue a strong defence, with only the group's attorney sitting at the defendant's table when the verdict was announced. The attorney previously claimed he hadn't been given enough time to prepare a defence.

Both Stanley and Joyce Boim delivered emotional testimony describing their pain after their son was murdered.

On the witness stand, Joyce Boim tried to give the jury a sense of her son, describing him as the family peacemaker – a sweet, happy, funny boy who volunteered on an ambulance. She remembered how he would bound up the stairs after school, slamming the door as he came into the apartment, and lift the lids of pots simmering on the stove to see what she was making for dinner.

She told the jury about driving to the hospital after learning that David had been hurt and about the ambulance ride across town at breakneck speed to the trauma centre at Hadassah Hospital at Ein Kerem. A towel was wrapped around David's neck.

Soon after David was wheeled into the emergency room, a doctor came out to tell her that he had died, she said, weeping.

"I knew the second David died that I'd never be the same."

To this day, she said, she feels terrible numbness, shock and emptiness.

An economist testified that if David Boim had become a physician, he could have earned anywhere from $4 to $20 million in his lifetime. The Boims, who have lived in Israel since 1985, also sought an additional $6 million for mental anguish.

The total jury award was $52 million, which the judge automatically trebled under federal statutes.

Three of the four parties have had their assets frozen by the federal government, while a fourth group – the Islamic Association for Palestine – is believed to have minimal assets.

Chicago is a major centre for the Hamas support network, said Stephen Landes, one of the attorneys representing the Boim family, though the defendants maintained that they had no ties to terrorism.

During closing arguments, he called the three Islamic charitable groups "the oxygen that keeps the terror support system going."

It takes money to buy the gun that killed David Boim, to train the terrorists that killed him, to indoctrinate others into lives of terrorism and to provide for the terrorists' families when the terrorists are jailed or commit suicide, Landes said.

"They beat the drums for terrorism," he said of the defendants. "They were the publicists."

ATRIUM DEDICATED: The Glina family returned from Netanya, Israel, recently after dedicating an atrium in the Children's Medical Centre of Laniado Hospital in honour of bar mitzvah boy Zev Glina, right. Zev's Atrium will provide a quiet place for children at the hospital to play and read indoors. Seen with Zev at a ceremony affixing a mezuzah to the atrium doorway are, from left, his sister Cheri Glina, his grandmother Helen Glina, his mother Debbie Tessler and his father Ed Glina. The Children's Medical Centre is dedicated to the 1.5 million Jewish children who perished in the Holocaust.

Israel to play Iran in York basketball tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel will play Iran in a goodwill basketball tournament later this winter – but it won't be each country's best tipping off against one another.

Students from Israel and Iran at York University will represent their home countries at a friendly tournament scheduled for late February and early March. Other entries in the International Basketball Tournament at York (IBTY) will represent Canada, Serbia, Croatia, Turkey, China, Greece, Somalia and the United States. As many as 12 countries may be represented when the event begins.

The tournament is the brainchild of Doron Berger, a student of public relations at Seneca College who is involved with Hillel@York. Berger organized a similar competition last April at the University of Toronto that also featured an international lineup of students representing their homelands.

Croatia defeated Israel in the championship game, but more importantly, the tournament "created good relationships on campus," Berger said.

Berger is hoping for a similar result at York, where tensions related to the Mideast conflict have tended to preoccupy many Jewish students on campus.

"A lot of the programs we run cater to one particular issue," he said. "We wanted to create something that is inclusive. We wanted it to be innovative and community-wide and foster good relations with different student groups."

"Some Jewish students are turned off by politics and if they see something that's not politics – international basketball – they'll be turned on to the club."

Berger said he had no trouble recruiting teams for the event. "In one week, I recruited seven teams."

"The Iranians were very enthusiastic. I asked them if they had a problem playing with Israel and they said, 'No.' I think that's very positive."

Nariman Farsad, vice-president of York's Iranian Student Association (ISA), said political differences that may divide Iran and Israel didn't enter into the decision to participate. "We basically don't care about the political parts of the conflict," he said.

The ISA is a social and cultural club and basketball fits under that umbrella. The ISA does not believe in dragging politics into a sporting event, he added.

Berger said all the student clubs he has contacted were enthusiastic about IBTY, except the Palestinians, who did not respond to his invitation.

"There's a lot of buzz about the tournament," he said.

To give it a real international flavour, national anthems will be played before each game in the round robin event.

"I think people like the fact it's multicultural, the fact they're playing against clubs that have the same goal in mind," he said. "The multicultural aspect is the selling point. It's like a mini-Olympics."

New student group looks to nurture future leaders

By TANIA HAAS
Special to The CJN

Minutes into a description of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), Gary Diamond stops mid-sentence and says in a non-aggressive, but direct, manner, "This article will focus on CFJS as a group, and not exclusively on my role as the president, right?"

Diamond would rather the emphasis be on the group's plan to develop new student Jewish leadership in Canada.

"We're not just another acronymn. We are student leadership consultants," he said.

And busy ones at that. In less than 11 months, CFJS has made contact with almost every Jewish student association in the country and has already helped some deal with conflicts on their campuses.

It's also developing relationships with Jewish professional associations.

"We are creating a collaborative network so that we can learn from one another. Over the past year, CFJS has reached out to Jewish and Israel-related student groups on campuses from coast to coast. The student response has been very encouraging."

Gary Diamond

CFJS was formed last January after Canadian Jewish student leaders returned from a conference in Israel hosted by the World Union for Jewish Students. Inspired by their international counterparts, they created CFJS after a weekend of brainstorming. Diamond was elected vice-president of internal affairs.

"We were very excited with the potential of CFJS. We decided our ultimate role was to bring about leadership development and to assist with communication on campuses. Through this we could act as the representative voice of Canadian Jewish leaders."

Leadership and communication skills are just two of Diamond's strengths. Born and raised in South Africa, he came to Canada to attend the University of Western Ontario. Almost immediately, he became involved with Jewish student associations, and served as president of campus Hillel for the 2003-2004 school year.

He was accepted into UWO's law school for this fall, and September was Diamond's first month as both the new CFJS president and as a first-year law student.

"I'm a little nervous about the December exams," he said earlier this fall. "CFJS has been keeping me pretty busy."

In October, Diamond helped organize a student conference in Ottawa with the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), and last month, he attended the United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Cleveland.

"Gary is a natural born leader" said Lance Davis, director of National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) and one of CFJS's multiple professional partners.

"He can bring a group of strong-willed leaders together and work as a team. He is a sophisticated planner and a strategic thinker. He always thinks 'What are my end goals?' – not only for next year, but for the next five years."

Diamond sees student involvement as an investment in the future of Canadian Jewish leadership.

"I think getting students involved in Jewish leadership will enrich the student's life. Ultimately, CFJS succeeds if Hillel succeeds."

CFJS has helped student leaders deal with the rise in anti-Israel sentiments on campus, most recently with Waterloo Hillel's response to statements made on TV's Michael Coren Show by Mohammed Elmasry. The University of Waterloo professor and president of the Canadian Islamic Congress told Coren that all Israelis over 18 are fair game for Palestinian violence.

"Campuses can be a hostile environment. We help by connecting student leaders to our professional partners like NJCL and United Israel Appeal Federations Canada, who can assist with press releases."

Diamond is modest but optimistic about his role in influencing future Jewish leaders.

"The idea of creating an organization that will have a direct impact on my peer group and leaders of the future is such a motivating force and a great experience."

Experts discuss health, Botox, cosmetic procedures

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When one thinks of the Weizmann Institute of Science, subjects such as DNA, cancer research, electron microscopes, cell structure and brain functioning come to mind.

A recent all-day program sponsored by Weizmann Women & Science, held at the Park Hyatt Hotel, showed that the institution also recognizes the significance of the everyday.

Mark Hyman, co-medical director of the Canyon Ranch in the Berkshires; Stephen Kraft, professor of ophthalmology, department of ophthalmology and vision sciences at the University of Toronto, and staff ophthalmologist at the Hospital for Sick Children and the Toronto Western Hospital; and Stephen Mulholland, a cosmetic plastic surgeon and surgical director of SpaMedica, spoke about "Looking Great, Feeling Better – the mind-body connection."

There is a radical change in the practice of medicine, Hyman said. Medicine now concentrates on acute and chronic illnesses, and on public health matters, such as AIDS or the recent SARS epidemic. Ignored are the impact of such matters as financial status and relationships on health.

"Most people die from things that can be controlled in the U.S., such as smoking, obesity and lack of exercise..." Mainstream medicine, Hyman said, concentrates on causes of illness, rather than on prevention of it.

Individuals need proper food, vitamins and minerals, light, water and air, and love. They may have to be cleansed of toxins, allergens, microbes or stress.

People in America are not getting the proper care for the money that is spent on health care. "We spend more than any other country, but are 27th in life expectancy," Hyman charged.

Drugs, he said, don't cure disease – they merely suppress the symptoms. An example is the anti-inflammatory drug Vioxx, which was found to cause heart disease. Glucosamine, on the other hand, prescribed for arthritis, is an anti-inflammatory, stops pain – and repairs the joint.

Genes are not a cause of disease, he said. Rather, it becomes a question of how lifestyle and environment interact with a genetic predisposition. This includes the recently discovered BRCA-1 gene found often in Ashkenazi Jewish women, which predisposes them to breast cancer.

Other factors that prevent a proper state of health are lack of exercise, deficiencies in essential omega-3 fatty acids, lack of vitamins, malnutrition (even in wealthy western nations) and too much junk food.

Intake of antioxidants is essential, Hyman said. "Eat dark, colourful food, like blueberries," he advised.

Don't wait until you are sick to get healthy, he concluded.

Mulholland stressed that true beauty comes from both the outside appearance and inner health. "We must focus on what happens inside before we can look to the surface."

However, he warned, one must beware the plethora of incompetent surgeons, such as those who operated on celebrities Marie Osmond and Mary Tyler Moore, leaving them with mask-like, inexpressive faces.

Light therapies are a big part of Mulholland's practice. He called light "a panacea for all kinds of problems, including brown spots, rosacea,wrinkles, acne and hair removal."

Surgery, he said, is the "last opportunity. It's for those who say 'I want the best even if I die from it.'"

Stephen Kraft is one of the first physicians to have used Botox in Canada. Originally, it was used to treat crossed eyes in children, he said, along with those with disabling neurological diseases. He now also uses it in cosmetic treatment of prominent facial wrinkles, brow furrows, forehead lines, crow's feet and prominent neck cords.

Much research has been done on Botox at the Weizmann Institute, Kraft said. Botulinum toxin, the chemical name for Botox, works by relaxing the muscles by preventing nerve stimulation of the muscles. Results don't show up for three to five days, he explained. The effects can last for about four months.

Botox is the treatment of choice for spasm of the eye and face muscles, such as Bell's palsy. The injection sites vary depending on where relief is needed. It is also useful to treat tight arm or leg muscles from cerebral palsy or strokes; voice box cramps; spasm of the stomach sphincter muscles; cramps in the legs or arms, and pain relief.

Side effects are rare, Kraft said, since therapeutic doses are so very low – point four billionths of a gram.

Kraft noted that the benefits are not just physical. "There are also psycho-social benefits, such as increased confidence."

Suggestions for healthful eating that were mentioned during the question period included using mainly extra-virgin olive oil, or small amounts of cold pressed nut oil, sesame oil or canola oil.

Hyman warned against the trend to eliminate carbohydrates completely from the diet. "It's a question of quality. Eat carbs like vegetables and nuts, particularly in foods that also contain protein or fat, like fruit and nuts."

BASKETS FOR THE HOMELESS: Seven members of Ve'ahavta Chaverim Vaughan Chapter gathered at the home of Marleine Kay-Levin earlier this month to make decorative baskets containing such items as socks, gloves, hats, toothbrushes and soap. The baskets will used as centrepieces at simchahs to raise funds and awareness for Ve'ahavta's homeless initiatives, and will then be hand-delivered to homeless people through Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless. James Laxer's Red Diaper Baby evokes a bygone era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

There was a period, from the late 19th century to about the mid-1950s, when communism was the siren song of some idealistic Jews. James Laxer, in a memoir of his childhood, Red Diaper Baby (Douglas & McIntyre), addresses that broad theme and focuses on that bygone era.

In this pungent and revealing book, Laxer – a professor of political science at York University and the author of 15 books – zeroes in on his nonconformist parents.

Menachem Mendel Laxer, the son of an Orthodox Montreal rabbi and the recipient of a post-graduate degree in psychology, was an organizer and then a member of the central committee of the Communist Party in Canada. Edna May Quentin, who held a master's degree in social work, was daughter of a Protestant clergyman and scion of an upper-crust Toronto family. Both were true believers devoted to the cause of social justice and revolution. Their far-left philosophy rubbed off on Laxer.

Laxer, who ran second to David Lewis for the national leadership of the New Democratic Party in 1971, writes that his childhood was defined by their outlook. By the time he was five or six, his father had drilled into him the theory and practice of revolutionary politics.

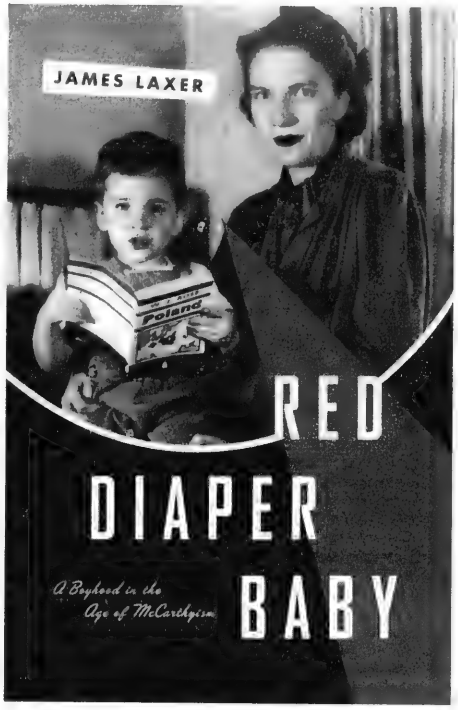
Because he lived in the shadow of their unpopular beliefs, Laxer inhabited two separate worlds, a public and a private one, in terms of his identity and ideas. "My truest early talent was my unerring knack for sliding from role to role, playing each one with complete sincerity," he recalls.

Laxer kept his beliefs to himself, fudged when asked about his father's occupation and danced around his ethnic background. "In our house, it was treated as a deep dark secret that my siblings and I – his sister and brother – were part Jewish… I was getting used to the idea that my life was divided into watertight compartments."

To say that Laxer was schizophrenic about his religious affiliation would be an understatement. Though he was circumcised, Laxer was christened and raised as a WASP, a white Anglo-Saxon Protestant. He can thank his father, a seemingly self-hating Jew, for this decision. Menachem Mendel, who went under the alias of Robert Owen, believed that being Jewish was "an unnecessary complication." Yet Menachem Mendel had no compunction about celebrating Christmas with a Christmas tree in the living room.

The Jewish holidays were painful for Laxer. "I looked every inch a Jewish kid," he observes. Classmates wondered why he had not skipped school and, once, a teacher posed the same uncomfortable question. "'I'm not Jewish,' I replied, feeling tight inside, feeling violated and miserable."

Laxer, however, could navigate his conflicting identities like a seasoned sailor. "I could blend in perfectly with either the Jews or the WASPs when I was with them on their own."



But, as he admits, problems arose when the two sides awkwardly mixed, like oil and water. "When they got together, I was stuck, not knowing which guise to adopt. And I didn't really feel I fit in with either. When I went to Montreal to visit my Jewish relatives, I knew I wasn't Jewish. In Toronto, the real world where I lived, I couldn't make myself feel exactly like a WASP. I could fake the externals well enough – I spoke perfect WASPY English – but something on the inside of my body was telling me different."

In the final analysis, Laxer was alienated from his Jewish background. He did not understand his Jewish relatives' Yiddish jokes, and was affected by his mother's perception that they considered her a "shiksa." As he writes: "They brought me back to the world I lived in, the world that she and my father had designed for me, the world in which I was not supposed to be Jewish."

Laxer probes the roots of his ambivalence toward his Jewishness, and in doing so, he inevitably comes back to his father. Born in Montreal in 1915, Menachem Mendel was the product of a staunchly observant home. At six or seven, Menachem Mendel "played the highly prized role of cantor at his father's weekly religious services."

Menachem Mendel was groomed to be a rabbi, but at 14, after reading Charles Darwin's On the Origins of Species and immersing himself in socialist literature, he shifted course. "But why he broke with Judaism has never been entirely clear to me," Laxer acknowledges.

Communism appealed to Menachem Mendel because of his core need for faith as "a compass by which he could make sense of a disordered world." But as far as Laxer is concerned, he traded in "one orthodoxy" for another.

What finally drove Menachem Mendel to communism, while studying at McGill University, was the rise of fascism in Europe. "Stopping the Nazis became his passion, and the Communist Party was the only instrument he believed was up to the job."

Laxer's mother, whose father had been a Methodist missionary in China, was radicalized by her membership in the Student Christian Movement at the University of Toronto. She and Menachem Mendel met in Montreal, and for him, it was a perfect match. "My father was anxious to escape the last vestiges of his Jewish origins. He had fought his way out of his father's religion and found his true calling."

A dedicated communist, Menachem Mendel was a workaholic. In 1955, a year before his first trip to the Soviet Union, he managed J.B. Salsberg's campaign for re-election in the Ontario provincial riding of St. Andrew. Salsberg, a trade unionist and a communist, was later a Canadian Jewish News columnist.

Menachem Mendel was wined and dined in the Soviet Union. "It was a heady experience to go from being a member of a marginal, reviled organization in Canada to being feted by the Soviet establishment," Laxer notes.

But within a year of his visit, Menachem Mendel and Edna May left the Communist party, their faith shattered by two events: Nikita Khrushchev's startling revelations about Joseph Stalin's crimes and Moscow's brutal intervention in Hungary. Salsberg, disgusted by reports of widespread anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union, resigned as well.

After leaving the party, Menachem Mendel and Edna May quietly dropped their old friends and reinvented themselves. She returned to social work. He worked as a psychologist at the Toronto General Hospital and then as a teacher at York University and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

As for Laxer, he, too, rejected communism. He had come full circle.

The Barenaked Ladies get some Chanukah ruach

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Barbra Streisand has one. So does Neil Diamond, Kenny G and Harry Connick Jr. They're all Jews with Christmas albums.

One Jewish rock star, however, has recently recorded songs for Chanukah.

Steven Page, frontman for the band Barenaked Ladies, sings three songs about the Festival of Lights for the band's new holiday CD Barenaked for the Holidays.

"People seem to like to have holiday music play in their homes at that time of year," Page said, relaying a comment that came up when he was discussing the idea with his bandmates.

"So I said, 'Well, fine. But we do Chanukah at my house.'"

Thus, he took on the task of offering tunes with Jewish themes. There's the traditional Hanukkah Oh Hanukkah, and I Have a Little Dreidel. But Hanukkah Blessings, written by Page, is an original song.

Page said the the new disc grew out of holiday songs the band would play when touring during December. What's more, they had already recorded some Christmas songs. God Rest Ye Merry Gentlemen/We Three Kings, a duet with chanteuse Sarah McLachlan, became a surprise minor hit. And a few years ago, the band wrote and sang Green Christmas for the movie Dr. Seuss' How The Grinch Stole Christmas.

Because of Barenaked Ladies' reputation for being quirky, Page said, he thought his bandmates expected his Jewish contributions to the album to be humorous, like the Hannukah Song, the tongue-in-cheek ditty made famous by Adam Sandler on TV's Saturday Night Live.

"But I wanted a melodic idea that was personal to me. I found more attachment to Chanukah blessings. The song I set out to write was where I wanted to sing about someone who celebrates Chanukah in a society where everyone else celebrates Christmas," he said, adding that he also wanted to avoid the cliché of dreidels, chanukiyot and latkes.

"You can feel isolated from mainstream culture. It's difficult to remember that we have our own culture, religion and celebration. It's easy to just go home and light the candles and forget about the rest. But my kids have re-taught me that lesson, to remember Chanukah and what it's about."

Despite avoiding them in his song, Page – who lives in Toronto with his wife, Carolyn, and two young sons, Isaac and Benjamin – is quick to note that he and his family light a chanukiyah, eat latkes and play with dreidels on the holiday.

"We always enjoyed the food part of it. My wife puts on a killer latke-fest every year," he said.

"I'm not sure if I ever got a good Chanukah present. A sock one night; another sock the other night. Then the third night I heard, 'What else do you want? You got a pair of socks!'"

Steven Page

The band became international icons after their 1998 album Stunt and its hit single One Week.

Page, 34, attributes the band's success and longevity to its easygoing nature and the strength of its music.

"Some of it has to do with the personality with the band members, and that fans have gotten to know us and grown up with us. It's the value of the songs.

"They tell us 'This song or this album reminds me of a special time in my life.' Rather than see the music as transient, they see it as timeless."

The Barenaked Ladies will play Massey Hall in Toronto on Dec. 20 and 21.

Facing Windows is an enchanting film

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Every once in a while you come across a film that wins your heart and enchants you beyond your expectations. Such was the case with a small Italian film called Facing Windows, which arrived in video stores a short time ago.

At first glance there is nothing special about this film. It begins with the murder of a baker during the Nazi occupation of Rome and then switches to the present time where we are swept into the world of a contemporary young Italian couple, Giovanna and Filippo, living in a middle class section of Rome.

They have the usual problems of making ends meet and of living together.

They have two young children. Giovanna works in the office of a poultry factory and moonlights by baking pastries and desserts for a local pub. Filippo has trouble hanging onto a job.

A handsome young man lives across the street and Giovanna becomes fascinated by the activities in his apartment which she can see from her window.

One day the couple runs across a lost and bewildered old man. He can't remember his name or where he lives and carries no wallet or identity papers.

The old man winds up staying over in the couple's apartment. Eventually, Giovanna discovers the man's name and address and returns him to his place of residence. She is surprised to learn that the man was a renowned pastry chef before he retired and was also a Holocaust survivor.

The old man's senses return and he encourages Giovanna to take control of her life and do what she really wants to do, and that is to train to be a pastry chef.

The film is a perfect blend of its various elements. The story is very human and realistic, while a sensitive music score helps advance the story.

The acting is superb. Giovanna Mezzogiorno gives a remarkable performance as the wife seeking a more fulfilling life, while the late Massimo Girotti gives a compelling performance as David, the Jewish Holocaust survivor who had to make a decision during the Nazi occupation of Rome that affected the rest of his life.

Facing Windows played in theatres for a very short time, but now it is available for all to see in the comfort of their own homes. It may not be a classic film, but no one who sees it will walk away unaffected.

THE UNDERGROUND REPORTERS TELLS STORY OF SECRET WARTIME NEWSPAPER IN CZECH VILLAGE

Toronto's Second Story Press came out recently with a new title in its award-winning Holocaust Remembrance Series for Young Readers.

The Underground Reporters by Kathy Kacer focuses on the true wartime exploits of a group of Jewish youths in the small Czech village of Budejovice during the period of Nazi occupation. Increasingly persecuted and isolated, they established a secret newspaper called Klepy (Gossip) and hand-printed 22 issues between August 1940 and April 1942, when Budejovice's 1,000 Jews were deported to the Terezin concentration camp.

Drawings, stories, a sports report, comics, and a humour section were often included in the newsletter Klepy, produced by Jewish youth in Budejovice. The title means "Gossip."

In contrast to the darkness of the times, the newspaper was essentially light-hearted and meant to pick up everybody's spirits. A cartoon of a "gossipy woman" usually appeared on its cover.

It started as a few typewritten pages but evolved into a more elaborate publication, filled with paintings, jokes, poetry and editorials, all created in the midst of war. Each issue had only one copy that was passed from hand to hand among the Jewish villagers and their friends.

Toronto resident John Freund was one of the original contributors to Klepy and one of the few to survive the war. His story, as told to Kacer, forms an important part of the book. Last summer, as part of her research, Kacer and her husband travelled with Freund to Prague and Budejovice.

On an earlier trip in 1989, Freund visited a surviving sister of the magazine's founder, Ruda Stadler, who did not survive. "I asked her, 'Do you have these magazines?' and she had them hidden in a suitcase in a cupboard somewhere." The originals were later donated to the Prague Jewish Museum.

Several years ago, Freund helped produce a Toronto version of Brundibar, the children's opera from Terezin, and Kacer's daughter was in the cast. Kacer later wrote Clara's War about the Brundibar opera. The former psychologist is also the author of The Secret of Gabi's Dresser and The Night Spies, earlier titles in the Holocaust Remembrance Series.

Since "the only way to beat death is by memory," Freund said he has derived "a lifetime satisfaction to think that I helped to keep these memories alive." The book has already received numerous plaudits and, typically for Kacer, may yet be honoured with a literary award.

Freund gave a signed copy of The Underground Reporters to Holocaust historian Sir Martin Gilbert, who sent him a thank-you note in which he called it "one of the most powerful books I have read on the Holocaust."

Names in the News: Sony Pictures is coming out with a screen version of Shakespeare's controversial play The Merchant of Venice, with Al Pacino as Shylock. The work "easily rivals Mel Gibson's Passion in its ability to inspire controversy" reports the New York-based Forward, which indicates that director Michael Radford took a philo-Semitic approach and set the story within the context of centuries of anti-Jewish persecutions... Adam Fuerstenberg, director of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, was the opening speaker at a major international Holocaust conference in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in late November. He spoke in Yiddish on the topic "Are the Lessons of the Holocaust Relevant Today?" and his talk was afterwards translated into Spanish. He was also interviewed for half an hour on the city's Jewish radio station, Radio Chai... A collection of rare Hebrew books sold at auction recently in New York. Included among the 65 incunabula was a first printed edition of Maimonides's Guide for the Perplexed... Historian-author Dr. Jack Granatstein is a recent recipient of the $5,000 Pierre Berton Award, named after the Canadian literary legend who died earlier this month.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

LEADING ISRAELI ARCHEOLOGIST DEVOTES LIFE TO STUDY OF JERUSALEM

Dan Bahat, a leading Israeli archeologist, is in the midst of an extended stint as visiting lecturer at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto.

A senior lecturer at Bar-Ilan University and former chief archeologist of Jerusalem, Bahat is frequently invited to give talks. Earlier this month, he gave a keynote address at a Toronto seminar on Christian pilgrimage hosted by the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO).

He has lectured to Christian groups around the world on Jerusalem in the time of Jesus and was once invited by Pope John Paul II to do so at the Vatican. He seems equally versed on Jerusalem in the eyes of Islam and did his PhD thesis on Jerusalem in the Crusades period. Although his specialty is Second Temple Jerusalem, he is possibly the only authority anywhere on the topography of Jerusalem in the Middle Ages.

In his 40 years as an archeologist, Bahat has produced dozens of books and papers, including the much-republished Illustrated Atlas of Jerusalem and a popular illustrated volume two years ago on the Western Wall tunnel, over which he is excavations supervisor.

Within that ancient subterranean passage, which extends along the western perimeter of the Temple Mount, archeologists have uncovered a large water channel that is widely accepted as an aqueduct built by the Maccabees.

The first family of Chanukah, the Maccabees are celebrated in the Jewish world for restoring Jewish sovereignty over Israel, rededicating the Temple and lighting lamps with one day's worth of oil that miraculously lasted for eight days. According to Bahat, they were also major builders who transformed Jerusalem and likely inspired King Herod's vision of the Temple.

"The problem is that Herod the Great built so thoroughly that many remains of the Maccabeans have almost disappeared," he said of the family that was also known as the Hasmoneans.

The tunnel aqueduct is "the most important remain of Hasmonean Jerusalem today," he said. "It's an enormous ditch that was excavated from the surface in order to supply water to the fortress named Baris, which was the seat of the Maccabean family before they moved to a place in the area of today's Jewish quarter."

The Maccabees' architectural footprint was almost fully erased in Jerusalem by King Herod's massive construction projects, Bahat said.

Without archeological evidence "it's very difficult for us to decipher what exactly they have done. But there's no doubt the Maccabees greatly contributed to the [national] consciousness of the importance of the Temple. Because after the Maccabean period, there's no question that the Temple was the centre of Jewish life in all respects."

Born in 1938, Bahat grew up in Eretz Yisrael in an era when Jewish access to the Old City of Jerusalem seemed a far-away dream. It was the precision of Michael Ave-Yonah's famous model of Jerusalem in the Holy Land Hotel that first inspired him to study all available scriptures and texts about the Old City.

"I thought, 'If he can do it, so can I,'" Bahat recalled. "I never imagined that I would ever really be in the Old City of Jerusalem, so I thought that at least theoretically, I could get to know it very well."

He chose to specialize in the Second Temple period because the era marked "the apex of Jerusalem as a Jewish city," he said. "Remember the saying, 'The one who hasn't seen Jerusalem hasn't seen a beautiful city in his life,' or the other saying, 'Of the ten parts of beauty in the world, Jerusalem took nine.'"

When he attained his BA from Hebrew University in 1964, Jerusalem was still divided and not much literature was available in Hebrew about the Old City. "Most of the study of Jerusalem was done by non-Jews, mainly by Christians interested in the city where Jesus walked," he recalled.

The restoration of Jewish sovereignty over the Old City in 1967 prompted an unprecedented boom of Jewish-led archeological investigations. "The result of that is that today our knowledge of Jerusalem has increased immensely. We can't compare our knowledge of Jerusalem in 1967 to what we know today."

Bahat has worked on many major archeological digs in Israel, including the ancient synagogue in Beit Shean and the mountaintop fortress at Masada. It was at Masada that he made one of his most remarkable finds – a group of shards with Hebrew names on them, dating from the moment of the dramatic fall of the Jewish stronghold to the Romans in CE 73.

The father of four sons continues to focus most of his scholarly attention on the city to which he has devoted much of his career.

"All my life is based on studying Jerusalem," he said. "It's a lifetime job – it's not a simple thing. It's a multi-faceted city. The field is so complex and so complicated, but so interesting. So I'm kind of addicted to Jerusalem."

Correction: The name of the marketing manager of IGTO Toronto, Jerry Adler, was incorrectly reported in this space last month.

Pot of Love is a delightful book for kids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the special joys of being a parent is cuddling up with your children at night and telling stories. That is also a special joy of being a child, and many people fondly remember these experiences throughout their lives. Toronto mother Debra Kiez and her five children are no exception.

Kiez and one of her children, Rebecca Gross, 10, have taken it a step further, by writing a book based on that kind of story. A Pot of Love, a self-published effort, has recently come out. A delightful effort it is, too.

Written by Kiez and illustrated by Rebecca, the book tells the story of a little girl named Daisy, who lived with her grandmother in a cottage in the forest. Each day, they would gather vegetables, herbs, berries and nuts and make a big pot of soup.

Life was peaceful and happy, until one day, Daisy woke up to find that her grandmother was too ill to get out of bed. Panicked, she ran into the forest and asked the fairies for help. They told her to go to see the wise Wizard.

The Wizard advised Daisy to "make a pot full of love and kindness. Go home and make the stew as your grandmother has taught you."

Daisy did exactly as she was told, and she was thrilled to discover that the next day, her grandmother was well.

This story is one that Kiez told her children on Friday nights when they were all curled up together before bedtime. On a rainy, cold Sunday, she said, she suggested that she and Rebecca make a little book from the story – she would type it up, and Rebecca would draw the pictures.

A few months later, she took a trip to Winnipeg, where she used to live. When she showed the book to a friend, Yossi Cohen of Kromar Printing, he told them to redo the pictures in bright colours, using watercolours on watercolour paper, and he would print the book for them.

The technique he used was to have the pictures drawn with special watercolour pencils. Water was added afterwards, and the whole thing put together on cold press paper.

Kiez and Rebecca went to Winnipeg, where they watched the printing process.

"We flew there and back in one day," Kiez said. "Rebecca helped adjust the colours to the way she wanted them and she got to see the books being printed."

A few weeks later, the books arrived. Each of Rebecca's classmates received a copy. Others were sold at the school (for $6) and at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's fair this fall. The book is now available at the Indigo store at Yorkdale Mall, or from Kiez at 416-638-7322.

All proceeds go to the Canadian Wildlife Federation, a cause dear to Rebecca's heart. "She reads National Geographic Kids, Owl and Chickadee magazines," Kiez said.

Kiez herself is a lover of fairy tales, which she thinks are an important feature of childhood. "Children think that there is magic in life," she said. Some of that lingers, or should, into adulthood, she believes. "It's very sad if you can't wonder and marvel at the world around you."

We know that fairies don't really exist, Kiez said. But there are good people who reach out to those in need, like fairy godmothers and the Wizard in the book. "They aren't there by chance.

"Daisy didn't know that she had the power to help her grandmother. The fairies and the Wizard are symbolic of the love that exists between one another. It's reality of a different kind."

Rebecca hopes to be an artist when she grows up. She is taking art classes, and she does crafts, such as sewing, making toys, knitting and beading. She bakes cookies, scones and brownies, and makes spaghetti pie and egg drop soup. Eventually, she would like to work with a cake-maker, and learn how to add the special artistic touches that make cakes unique.

Younger sister Tamar, who is seven, is a great fan of fairy stories too. When she was smaller, she used to write letters to the fairies and got replies as well – with maybe just a little help from her mother.

Yiddish poetry meets country music

By RABBI LAWRENCE M. PINSKER
Special to The CJN

"Yiddish is no language for poetry," wrote Jacqueline Osherow in her poem The Yiddish Muses. But Marty Green, a young Winnipeg musician, Yiddishist and local cultural icon has trumped her dour comment.

Recently at the Berney Theatre of the Rady Jewish Centre in Winnipeg, Green took a long Yiddish rhyming poem and transformed it into a tour de force theatrical experience.

Marty Green: Tour de force theatrical experience.

In his hands, Y.L. Peretz' poem The Ballad of Monish, a bold and at times bawdy 19th-century reflection on the idealization of 18th-century Jewish piety, became a remarkable musical and comedic exploration of eastern European Jewish culture, Jewish religiosity and spirituality, and popular North American music.

Using exuberant musical motifs from country music, Green invited us on a creative yet scholarly tour of the world of the shtetl and the yeshiva that were at the heart of eastern European Jewish culture.

In two hours, he managed to honour Yiddish literature – and the complex mixture of admiration and resentment that existed between secularist and religious Ashkenazi Jews – and did so to an original soundtrack of his own composition.

Peretz's story centres on the yeshiva bocher Monish, who is "every Jew's" ideal – a brilliant scholar, steeped in Torah and Jewish ethics – and on how Satan determines to test Monish's mettle. With comic echoes of the Book of Job and a host of subtleties embedded in uniquely Yiddish references to Biblical and Talmudic texts, Peretz brilliantly describes Monish's world and life and how it is unravelled by Satan.

As Green spoke and sang his English translation of the poem, he paused, flashed images on the screen that formed the backdrop of the stage, and demonstrated how he has analyzed and organized Peretz's fertile imagery for a modern audience while wrestling with the need to preserve the integrity of the poem.

And he succeeds. The fictional Monish's struggles and the real Peretz's bemused respect for the ill-fated yeshiva student came alive in a way that would be difficult to convey in a simple reading of the text.

Green convincingly demonstrated the musical and cultural affinity between the spirit of Peretz's work and the musical legacy of Hank Williams, Merle Haggard and Patsy Cline.

By evening's end, the audience was humming Green's catchy music and reflecting on the extraordinary insights that remain long after the laughter and music of the stage show have ended.

Junior stars try to make impact in AHL

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

In this lockout season that's seeing NHLers taking spots in the American Hockey League, a few young Jewish skaters have joined their ranks and are making their pro debuts on the farm.

Eric Himelfarb and Adam Henrich, younger brother of the Edmonton Oilers' 1998 first-round pick Michael Henrich, are among the notable rookies in the AHL, while veteran Cory Pecker is starting his third season with the Cincinnati Mighty Ducks.

In his first pro game in the NHL's minor league system, Henrich, skating with the Springfield Falcons, scored two goals and led the team to a 4-3 win. By press time, he had amassed four goals and eight assists in 24 games and was fourth in scoring for the Tampa Bay affiliate.

Adam Henrich

"I was a little nervous at first," said Henrich, 20, from his home in Springfield, which he shares with fellow Falcon Paul Ranger. "You are [competing] against players who have played in the NHL. It was cool to score."

Henrich, six-foot-four, 234 pounds, is a former star with the Brampton Battalion of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), but he knows he has lots to do if he wishes to continue to improve and reach the next level. He said he has to work on being more consistent every night and maturing as a player.

The CJN reached Himelfarb, 21, on his cellphone in Grand Rapids, Mich., while he was shopping for a team costume party.

"I got a 'Kill Bill' costume," he said with a laugh. "I bought a little, tight, skimpy outfit with a blond wig."

The young sniper seemed thrilled with his first full pro-season. He used the word "great" countless times during a conversation with The CJN. From the coaching, to the team, to the city, to living on his own, to life in general, it was all just "great."

Eric Himelfarb

"I have a lot more responsibility this year. It's fun living with someone on the team," he said, referring to his roommate, rookie Brett Lebda. Like Himelfarb, Lebda signed with Grand Rapids, Detroit's AHL affiliate, at the end of last season.

This year, the team got off to a 5-2 start with Himelfarb scoring two goals and two assists, continuing last season's torrid pace. After 22 games, the five-foot-nine, 170-pound centre was third in scoring for the Griffins with five goals and nine assists.

Himelfarb signed with the Griffins late last season, before their playoff run and after his Kingston Frontenacs were bounced from the OHL playoffs.

Himelfarb and Henrich, who both hail from Thornhill, understand that only a small percentage of players will survive the minor league grind and make it to the "show" (the NHL).

Henrich also faces comparisons to his older brother, Michael. The elder Henrich played 214 games in the AHL for three different clubs and spent some time in Sweden as well. He was released by the Hartford Wolf Pack, the New York Rangers' affiliate, in training camp this season, but not before playing an exhibition game against his younger brother.

"We talk almost every day and I've watched him play a lot, but it was weird to play against him. We lined up against each other a few times, too," Adam said.

They didn't fight – Adam said he would never fight his brother – but the younger Henrich said he has learned a tremendous amount from his big brother, not the least of which is working hard every night.

Like many professional hockey players, Michael is off to Europe in the coming weeks to play hockey in Austria.

"If there is a lesson to be learned from Michael, it's that you are only as good as your last shift," said Springfield assistant coach Phil Russell.

The younger Henrich has a lot of work to do, but is playing well, said Russell. who played more than 1,000 games in the NHL. Russell said the team is pleased with Henrich's development.

Perhaps Himelfarb's coach, Danton Cole, who played more than 300 games in the NHL, offered the best advice for players skating alongside many who would be in the NHL if not for the lockout.

"[They're] playing against men, not just young boys anymore. There is a lot of competition and [they] have to come along quickly," Cole said.

Pecker, meanwhile, had two assists in his first 20 games.

Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH and BEVERLY KRAFT

Beverly: It's difficult to imagine a more exciting finish than the 1-IMP victory by the United States over Italy on the final deal of the Monte Carlo Bermuda Bowl in 2003, but the Spingold Knockout in New York this July produced a comparable ending. After three-quarters of their semifinal match, Jacobs (George Jacobs/Ralph Katz, Lorenzo Lauria/Alfredo Versace and Howard Weinstein/Steve Garner) had built a seemingly insurmountable lead of 71 IMPs over Nickell (Nick Nickell/Richard Freeman, Jeff Meckstroth/Eric Rodwell, Bob Hamman/Paul Soloway), largely on the strength of vastly superior play. But Nickell wasn't about to give up.

Eric: Many players believe that the way to erase a huge deficit is to play a very busy game, opening and over-calling very light, making wild pre-empts, jumping to game or slam if there's a hint of possibility, doubling anything that breathes, and the like. I've never seen that strategy work and can tell you from bitter experience that I've lost a couple of matches that I believed we'd rescued, because teammates tried to do too much. The truth is that you've got to be quite lucky, give nothing away and look for sensible opportunities to swing in the bidding or the play. If I told you that eight of the 16 deals in the final quarter were tied or yielded only 1-IMP swings, would you believe that the score for the session was 84-2?

Beverly: I know you're not kidding. How did that happen?

Eric: On Board 50, Hamman made a passive lead rather than start with a high honour from AK2 in dummy's second-bid suit. The "reflex" lead would have given away the contract: gain 11.

On Board 51, Meckstroth held: AJ1095 KJ864 3 A8. When his passed-hand partner responded 2♥ to 1♠, Jeff jumped all the way to 6♥. Rodwell guessed the play correctly after a favourable (non-club) lead to bring in 13 IMPs.

Two part-score deals netted Nickell 13 IMPs, but with five deals left to play the margin was still 34 IMPs.

On board 60, Meckstroth/Rodwell bid and made an excellent grand slam that might have been defeated with a different opening lead. Jacobs/Katz had a mix-up about how to show aces after Blackwood had been doubled (work hard on your game, kids, it pays) and stopped in 6♠. 11 IMPs more.

On Board 61, Soloway was allowed to make an obscure 2♦ doubled for plus 180, while his teammates collected a 500-point penalty from 1♠ doubled. 12 IMPs more. The Jacobs lead was down to 11 IMPs. Then:

At both tables the contract was 3NT by North on the lead of the ♣Q, the defenders clearing the suit (spade discard from West). Both East and West were known to hold a six-card black suit and two more of West's cards had been accounted for after the second round of clubs. East was therefore slightly more likely to hold longer diamonds, and, as a consequence, the ♦Q. However, Hamman saw an opportunity to create a swing in the play without paying much of a premium for the privilege. He led the ♦2 to the king and finessed the ♦10 on the way back, cashed the ♦A, crossed to the ♠A, cashed the diamonds and finessed against the ♠Q for nine tricks. His counterpart played diamonds the other way to go three down. 11 IMPs more and the match was tied.

Beverly: Nickell had gained 71 IMPs on the set. There was no swing on the penultimate deal, but after all the excitement, the match was decided on a deal on which luck did play a key role. These were the N/S cards:

North	South
♠108	♠Q2
♥AQJ72	♥83
♦K1073	♦AQ8
♣98	♣AKJ632

Garner/Weinstein reached 4♥, which needed a bit more than the ♥K onside or hearts three-three. The cards were not kind. Meanwhile, Hamman/Soloway reached 3NT with the spade lead indicated. West's spades were precisely AKJ9 so the suit was hopelessly blocked for the defence. West cased a high spade and switched to the ♥10, having passed initially. Soloway accurately rose with dummy's ace and took the successful club finesse, finishing +460. "Win by 11," screamed Meckstroth in the comparison, as he was keeping a running score.

Beverly: It was almost an anticlimax that Nickell should win the Spingold final the next day, beating Spector (Warren Spector/Mark Feldman, Ron Smith and Canadians Billy Cohen, Gavin Wolpert, and Vincent Demuy) by 44 IMPs.

Getting my Jewish fix

I grew up surrounded by Jewish friends in school and at camp. My neighbourhood wasn't predominantly Jewish, but there was something of a Jewish flavour that always made its way into my life. Between the bar and bat mitzvahs I attended as a child and the Jewish holidays and family gatherings I was constantly invited to, there was always something Jewish going on.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

When I recently travelled abroad, I felt disconnected from Jewish life because I stayed in areas of Europe that seemed so un-Jewish, so devoid of the flavour I was used to. I began to feel out of place, a bit like a bird with a clipped wing.

I tried to figure out what was missing and then it occurred to me: I needed a Jewish fix. Just as chocoholics need their daily Toblerone or Hershey's, I needed to have a shmooze with a Jewish woman, or walk through a Jewish bookstore, or hear a Yiddish accent.

This need for a Jewish connection became more powerful as the days went by. I found myself searching for someone or something that appeared to be Jewish. I looked at doorposts for mezuzot, but I didn't find a single one. I studied the signs in restaurants that appeared to be ethnic, wondering if I might find the equivalent of a "COR." Again, nothing. The more I explored the nooks and crannies of city streets, the less Jewish they appeared. There was not a Jew in sight, not a knish to be found, not a shul to walk into and not a kosher restaurant to be seen.

A blue Magen David necklace proudly hangs around my neck. In Toronto, I often get comments on it. Last month, in a small town in Muskoka, a woman in a doughnut shop stopped to tell me she liked it – and that she was Jewish too. We bonded instantly.

While abroad, I double-checked to make sure my necklace was still there – it was – but no one commented on it.

One Jewish man I met who had lived in Toronto for 20 years prior to moving overseas told me, "You won't find an equivalent to Bathurst Street, with Jewish stores in a row, or chanukiyahs in the windows at Chanukah – Judaism here is much more hidden. You have to know where to go."

This information made me sad, because it wasn't that Judaism wasn't there, it was simply hiding. I was sad for the Jews who live in such places around the world.

Later, trying to be positive, I arrived home in our wonderful city – a place where Judaica can be displayed as brightly as any Christmas light, or Honest Ed's storefront. I was reassured to discover that the ache I felt to meet someone Jewish – or taste something kosher, or saunter through a Jewish venue – came from inside of me, from a place of great pride in being Jewish. I missed the warmth of our community and that sense of belonging in the "hood."

I was happy to rediscover that, at my very essence, I like being Jewish. My soul is Jewish, and that means I am part of a very special people, with a collective heart that is striking.

I have always seen myself as a person of the world who found glory in other cultures – someone who was able to dance with the natives when they pounded their drums, to be mesmerized by Mennonites and their horses and buggies, and to ride camels with the Bedouin in the desert.

I still want to discover the world and uncover and digest the splendour that is produced by people of all cultures, but I am more certain than ever that one of my foremost character traits – a gene that lies within me, a feeling, a sense and understanding that is more powerful than any other – is my Jewishness.

Jewish values are the key

Seymour Epstein

Recently, I found myself explaining to a day school parent how Jewish studies is an integral part of the curriculum. The parent was complaining about the teaching methods in a particular classroom, and I had the distinct impression that what really mattered to this father was the teaching of general studies. In a moment of hyperbole, I exclaimed that I considered Jewish studies much more important and, indeed, the essence of the school. After the father regained his composure and I modified my radical stance, I regretted having considered my statement an exaggeration.

I place great importance on the general studies in our Jewish day schools and in the public schools – so much so, that I refuse to label them secular studies, since I think all learning is sacred. I am, nonetheless, cognizant of the fact that our Jewish schools exist for the sake of the holy supplement of Jewish studies to a general curriculum that is mostly amoral and valueless. The proof of that is that we continue to make vast and overwhelming progress in all of the areas covered in the general curriculum. Daily, we use and take for granted technologies that were the stuff of science fiction two decades ago. The sciences have given regular people lives that are more luxurious than those enjoyed by royalty and nobility of a previous age. But in the moral realm, we are worse than primitive.

History teaches us that at the height of the industrial revolution, people dreamt of a 20th century free of war and full of peace and tranquility. Blatant racism, immoral treachery and limitless greed turned that dream into a nightmare. At the end of the 20th century, we once again imagined the possibility of giving our children a better world, but already the 21st century has grossly disappointed us. While the world has progressed so rapidly in science and technology, it has regressed morally.

I was right the first time. The part of our curriculum that teaches the early ethical lessons of our tradition must be taught more effectively than anything else we teach, or we will doom another generation of grandchildren to further moral decay.

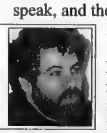
Menachem was right about Arafat

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

My friend Menachem and I often socialize on Sunday nights. We discuss life and debate Israeli politics and Jewish issues. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was often the subject of our talks.

Ever since the signing of the Oslo accords and the famous Rabin-Arafat handshake, Menachem has believed that Arafat, a man who had a thick layer of blood under his terrorist fingernails, could never be a genuine partner in peace with Israel.



URBAN WRITER

I disagreed. "We must have hope that Arafat, as the leader of the Palestinian people, can pursue a course of peace," I would say. "Besides," I asked later on, "isn't Ariel Sharon, our man chasing peace, the same person who left the gates of Sabra and Shatilla unguarded, allowing for the slaughter of innocent men, women and children."

When it comes to Arafat, Menachem was right and I was wrong.

It's clear to me now that he was unable to appreciate the purity of life. He was a megalomaniac who manipulated his people through fear and violence, the Arab world through doublespeak, and the Middle East by scapegoating Israel and the Jewish people.

Menachem was right when he said that any man who could murder children, as Arafat did in Ma'alot, could never transform himself from a sociopath into a statesman. Would we ever expect Paul Bernardo to become a humanitarian? Likely not. Why, then, did I believe that Arafat could exchange his sidearm for an olive branch?

Yet I did. I had hope, as did the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and millions of other Jews, that Arafat would honestly recognize Israel's right to exist. Those of us who believed this desired it with all of our hearts, and we had faith in the notion that all men can transform themselves. We were wrong. Some cannot.

Now that Arafat is gone, I ask myself this painful question: what damage did I cause by placing my hope in him as a partner in peace? Am I partially responsible for leaving my people unprotected, and for the bloodshed of innocent Jews and Palestinians? Was my gullibility about humankind in fact a knife that sat snugly in a scabbard of naiveté, a way of leaving the side door of Judaism and Israel open so that a depraved wind could blow through?

As I considered the answer to this question, I wondered about community members who were followers of Josef Stalin and the introspection they must have gone through upon hearing about his hand in the murder of 25 million people. How did the late J.B. Salsberg, a beautiful soul, and his cronies judge themselves when Stalin's Hitlerian colours began to shine like the noontime sun reflected off a sword?

From my discussions with Jewish community members who subscribed to communism, it seems that most of them handed in their Marxist badges and took responsibility for their bad judgment by ensconcing themselves even more deeply in the fight against social injustice.

This is what I have decided to do. I was wrong and am deeply troubled by the ramifications of my belief that Arafat would ever have considered peace with Jews. I realize that hope is paramount in life, but I understand that that there are those who are inherently depraved and cannot summon forth their own repentance. This realization saddens me greatly.

I continue to believe that peace will come to Israel and that a new generation of leaders might pursue alliance, not harassment; patience, not retribution; benevolence, not loathing. And like J.B., I will increase my commitment to tikkun olam – repairing the world – and work at a grassroots level for a political solution that so often seems to be as evasive as large quantities of oil after the destruction of a Temple.

Menachem was right. And I still have hope. Happy Chanukah!

Sharon says withdrawal will unite nation

Makes pitch for rapprochement with Palestinians

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

HERZLIYAH — If, indeed, it was the Jewish state's version of the State of the Union address, then things are good and getting better.

But there was more than just self-congratulation to Ariel Sharon's closing address last Thursday to the annual strategy conference known simply as the Herzliyah Conference. It was also the Israeli prime minister's chance to issue an appeal for rapprochement ahead of upcoming Palestinian Authority elections.

"The most genuine and greatest opportunity for building a new and different relationship with the Palestinians was created following the death of [PA president] Yasser Arafat, who constituted the primary obstacle to peace," Sharon said in a speech carried live by most major Middle East news channels.

"In light of the new opportunities and potential of a new Palestinian leadership, Israel will be prepared to co-ordinate various elements relating to our disengagement plan with the future Palestinian government," he told the policy forum's blue-ribbon audience.

It was the clearest statement yet of Sharon's willingness to recast his unilateral vision of withdrawing from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank next year as consensual. And though he did not mention anyone by name, the speech was aimed at the man almost certain to succeed Arafat as PA president in Jan. 9 elections: Mahmoud Abbas.

Israeli skates for Saskatchewan school

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israeli-born Oren Zamir has lived in Saskatchewan for only a few months now, but already he's absorbed many of the nuances of life on the Prairies.

Take, for instance, his understanding of the weather. It's pretty cold out here, he acknowledges, but "it's a dry cold."

Hmm, "dry cold." Not something he's likely to have heard growing up in Metulla.

Or how about his newfound appreciation of the "toughness" of Canadian hockey? After he had played only five games of AA midget hockey, an opponent drove him into the boards from behind, dislocating his shoulder. Welcome to Canadian hockey, Oren. Oh, and by the way, keep your head up.

Recruited in Metulla by Jean Perron

As for matters of faith, Zamir recognizes a huge irony in his new lifestyle. Back in Metulla, he and his family were not particularly observant. They attended religious services occasionally, especially during the High Holy Days. But at the Athol Murray College of Notre Dame, a Roman Catholic school in Wilcox, Sask., being part of a faith community is expected of students.

Faced with the prospect of attending Sunday services in church – an experience he found "weird" – Zamir has hooked up with a Jewish family in Regina who take him to Shabbat services every two weeks. It took his enrolment in a Roman Catholic school to increase his own Jewish observance, he said.

But while adapting to life in Canada has been one of the enjoyable challenges Zamir has faced, it's hockey that remains central to his Canadian experience. It was his passion for our national sport that brought him to Wilcox in the first place.

Thanks to being in the right place at the right time, Zamir is playing hockey for the Notre Dame Hounds. That's the same school that has produced such NHL luminaries as Brad Richards, Rod Brind'Amour, Curtis Joseph, Wendel Clark and Vincent Lecavalier.

Of course, not everyone at Notre Dame can aspire to the NHL. The school sponsors several good teams at various age groups and Zamir, 16, plays right wing on the third-best of Notre Dame's seven midget teams.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"Don't ever stop dreaming," says 80- year-old sculptor Phyllis Lipman, who recently held her first-ever, one-woman exhibition of her bronze and hydracal (heavy plaster) figures at Lipman Contemporary Art, a gallery owned by two of her three daughters, Marci and Louise.

"I loved art since I was a child," she says, "but life just got in the way. My art was interrupted by growing up."

When Lipman was eight years old, her principal at Regal Road Public School recognized her talent for painting and drawing and he arranged for her to take lessons. "I would take the streetcar alone from St. Clair Avenue and Dufferin to the Art Gallery of Ontario on Dundas for the lessons," she recalls.

When she graduated from Vaughan Road Collegiate, where she did illustrations for the yearbook, Lipman wanted to study at the Ontario College of Art. "My father discouraged me and I went to work in the family business, Breslin Industries, manufacturers of lamps," she says.

She married Captain Daniel Lipman, a dentist who was in the Canadian Dental Corps at CFB Camp Borden, and the couple lived in Barrie, Ont., where their first daughter, Judy, was born.

"When we moved back to Toronto, I became the typical stay-at-home mother and became a volunteer at Mount Sinai Hospital," Lipman says.

When she was in her mid-40s, and her daughters had moved out, she studied art at Central Technical School. "I studied sculpting and that's where I fell in love with it."

Then Lipman's husband died suddenly, at 53. "I stopped sculpting. I was very busy surviving," she says. "I became a full-time caregiver for my parents, in-laws and elderly aunt and uncle."

Lipman married fur broker George Levin 18 years ago, after a long friendship. "And then my life totally changed again," she says. "No more cottages – now it was golf at Oakdale and Florida."

Her friend, the well-known sculptor, Gloria Robins, encouraged her to join her in taking a summer course in sculpture at Central Tech seven years ago.

"Gloria told me it was time for me to get back to my sculptures. That was the beginning," Lipman says.

"We winter in Palm Beach, Fla., and I began working at the Armory in West Palm Beach and in Toronto at City Sculpture on Bloor Street." She also went to San Miguel d'Allende, Mexico, to sculpt. "It was a learning period for me," she adds.

Lipman describes herself as "self taught" and says, "I began having some pieces cast, but it was for my own pleasure because when I create something that satisfies me, I get a momentary high."

She laughed when her daughter Marci said, "I think we should put some of your pieces in the gallery." Lipman adds that having a solo exhibit had never occurred to her.

"I was in shock when some of my pieces were sold," says the grandmother of three and great-grandmother of four.

"What is so wonderful about doing sculpture is being with so many different people. We all have something in common. We form a bond and as the oldest, they come to me for advice."

Lipman says it is never too late to live out your dream. "I never stopped dreaming. I knew that one day I would work towards that dream. I didn't plan my life – it just happened. No matter what happens in your life, and I've had a lot happen, you have to come back to square one and advance to go."

Teen pleads guilty to firebombing UTT library

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Jewish community officials are convinced Sleiman Elmerhebi, who pleaded guilty last week to the April 5 firebombing of the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs (UTT) library, did not act alone.

Both Bill Surkis, regional director of B'nai Brith Canada, and Jeff Boro, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, said they are convinced Elmerhebi was set up.

But Boro, a criminal lawyer, said, "I believe there was a conspiracy. Unfortunately, the evidence did not justify the conspiracy charge, but… I am morally convinced other people acted with him… It's clear to me he is hiding something… His testimony did not have the ring of truth."

Surkis said he finds it "very difficult" to believe Elmerhebi was the sole author of the note left at the scene of the crime because the French is "too polished and literate," and because Elmerhebi's responses to questions by Aubé and Quebec Court Judge Jean Sirois were vague and evasive.

Sirois attempted unsuccessfully to get Elmerhebi to explain what he meant in the note, which was made public for the first time during the two-day sentencing hearing. Elmerhebi, now 19, answered that he wrote it by himself and that the signature "Les Brigades du Cheick Ahmed Yasine" (sic) was not an existing group, just something he thought up.

Aubé also failed to get a clear answer on why he committed the crime, other than that he became "emotional" after hearing about Israel's assassination of the Hamas spiritual leader a month earlier on television news. Elmerhebi was born in Lebanon and came to Canada at age seven. He is Muslim but not, according to evidence, observant.

The letter, written in French, says in part: "Today, our target was an empty place. Our goal was only to sound the alarm, without causing any deaths, but this is only the beginning. If your crimes continue in the Middle East, our attacks will continue… The next time, we will hit harder."

Aubé recommended a minimum sentence of two years in prison, and that the seven months he has been in custody not be taken into account. (The time an accused is held prior to sentencing actually counts for double.)

Aubé stressed that this was an "extremely serious" hate crime, which is an aggravating factor under the Criminal Code of Canada, and contrary to constitutional protection of multiculturalism. She also referred to it as a terrorist act. She cited Elmerhebi's own words in a wiretapped telephone conversation May 13, in which he talks about how he planned and committed the crime. He asks the other party, Ali Awada, if he thinks he'll go to prison. Awada answers: "Not for vandalism." Elmerhebi replies: "This isn't vandalism; it's terrorism." Elmerhebi was arrested the next day.

"At this point," Aubé said, police investigators have not established the existence of a terrorist organization, but raised doubt that only one person was behind the firebombing.

Elmerhebi is "essentially saying 'sorry, but don't ask me too many questions'," she said.

Other aggravating factors she cited were intimidation, the fact that an elementary school was the target, the damages (given as approximately $685,000 by UTT president Rachel Cohen), and the political motivation of avenging an international matter. It was also premeditated, she said, noting that Elmerhebi and another person were caught on videotape buying the six containers of kerosene used in the arson two days earlier at the Canadian Tire store on Cavendish Boulevard where he worked.

She also argued that Elmerhebi was aware enough of what he was doing to be thinking about how he might split the $50,000 reward (offered by B'nai Brith and the Sun Youth Organization), also on the wiretap.

His punishment should be "exemplary" to send a message that this type of behaviour is not acceptable in Canadian society, she said. Although the maximum for arson is 14 years, she took into account Elmerhebi's age and that this is his first offence, as well as sentences in similar cases in Canada.

Surkis said he was pleased with Aubé's emphasis on the hateful and grave nature of

Challenge to Jewish leaders (2)

Last week in this column, I wrote about the Jewish Agency for Israel's creation in 2002 of the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute. An independent think tank of "some of the finest Jewish minds in the world," the institute's mandate is to contribute "to the thriving future and continuity of the Jewish people and Judaism."

From the editor's desk

In furtherance of that mandate, the institute has undertaken a series of projects that examine various aspects of the Jewish condition in the 21st century.

The institute intends to annually assess the "state of the Jewish people." This summer, it published the executive report of the first of those annual assessments. It was called Between Thriving and Decline: The Jewish People 2004.

I introduced the framework of the report last week. In the words of Policy Institute chair Dennis Ross, the report is an unequivocal challenge to the leaders of the organized Jewish communities around the world. It "offers clear guidelines not only for what should be on the agenda for world Jewry, but also for how to approach such critical priorities as responding to demographic trends, communities at risk and preserving Jewish values."

In this column, I record some of the report's key observations. The report is divided into four sections:

- Main Findings;
- The Jewish People: a Comprehensive Evaluation;
- Jewish Communities around the World: Thriving or Declining?; and
- Strategic Assets, Critical Choice and Strategic Agenda.

The first section of the report ("Main Findings") is itself divided into four sections that discuss overall balance; external factors; internal factors; and critical choices and the strategic agenda. The starting point of the inquiry is a tell-it-like-it-is view through the telescope. "The survival of the Jewish people is not assured, though there are great opportunities for a thriving future. Therefore, determined and large-scale efforts are needed to maximize the opportunities and ward off the dangers. Doing so requires significant resources, judicious coping with critical decisions and a careful crafting of long-term grand policies."

The authors of the report identify 13 different pursuits that comprise the Jewish people's strategic agenda. These agenda items are more fully discussed in the closing (fourth) section of the report.

The second section is "The Jewish People: A Comprehensive Evaluation." It is a three-pronged probe that examines the global context of the current Jewish situation; the impact of the external environment on the Jewish people and on Judaism; and major internal trends within the Jewish people.

This is no mere superficial discussion of the material. The information is interwoven, inter-related and cross-referenced. It is, true to its title, comprehensively compiled. For example, under external influences upon the Jews, the report cites and fully discusses 12 different developments. Under major internal trends, the authors explore six important themes: continuity and identity; unity and division; numbers and security; economic and social standing; Israel-Diaspora interactions; and Diaspora-Diaspora interactions. The presentation is a fascinating weave of interconnecting threads.

The third section is rather rhetorically called "Jewish Communities around the World: Thriving or Declining." It divides the Jewish world into these groupings: the United States and Canada, Latin America, the European Union, the Former Soviet Union, Asia, Africa and the Pacific, and Israel.

The report contains a synopsis of each of the Jewish demographic groupings in the world. The mini-synopsis of the community in Canada is the following: "Canada rates among the most successful of Diaspora communities. With a population of 370,000, up from 356,000 in 1991, it is one of the few growing Jewish communities. The Canadian Jewish community is characterized by a strong Jewish identity, with 89 per cent identifying themselves as Jews by religion and 11 per cent ethnic Jews without religion.

"Despite initial red flags raised over the increase in interfaith marriage rates and a decline in the number of donations to Jewish Federation campaigns, indicators point to an overall maintenance, and even intensification, of Jewish identity in Canada."

The very next sentence suggests the reason for the authors' optimism concerning "overall maintenance and even intensification of Jewish identity in Canada."

"The Canadian Jewish community has a strong Jewish educational system, particularly in its day schools."

The authors of the report are effectively delivering an unsubtle message to our community leaders: it is vital to maintain and enhance access to the Jewish educational system in Canada.

The final section of the report ("Strategic Assets") reiterates and expands upon the 13 pursuits that the authors define as the pressing agenda for the Jewish people.

One set of statistics underscores the urgency of the agenda for our communal leaders: In 1970, the Jews of the world numbered 12,633,000. In 2003, that number is 12,950,000. The projected worldwide Jewish population in the year 2020 is 13,548,000. In 1939, there were approximately 18,000, 000 Jews in the world.

More people live in Cairo than there are Jews in the world. We have our work cut out for us.

Comedian brings his shtick to UJA supporters

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's fundraising campaign for 2005 has raised $48 million and is expected to raise at least $7 million more, according to Chuck Winograd, the campaign's co-chair.

David Brenner

Speaking at last week's campaign closing at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, which featured comedian David Brenner, Winograd said new contributions would be allocated to "community security, a more powerful Jewish voice, building a stronger Israel, and empowering a new generation to tackle anti-Jewish and anti-Israel hatred."

At the same time, he added, federation "will never neglect its core funding for Jewish education, anti-poverty initiatives, assistance for the vulnerable and absorbing the thousands of Jews each year who are finding refuge in Israel."

Of the total, an estimated $7 million was raised by Women's Campaign and Advocacy under the leadership of Fran Sonshine, said Robert Harlang, Winograd's co-chair.

Following Brenner's hour-long performance – a routine laced with Yiddishisms, Jewish content and some off-the-wall takes on current events – evening co-chair Susan Harris praised the Philadelphia-born comic's "humour and generosity of spirit." She was referring to his post-Sept. 11 decision to go on the road again, despite a secure contract in Las Vegas, and use his comedy to help people cope.

What inspired him, he said, was a comment by a young New York fireman who told Brenner following a performance shortly after Sept. 11, 2001 that he had lost seven of his "brothers" – fellow workers – who were with him in the World Trade Center that day. Although the firefighter had quit his job, Brenner's performance, which was free to fire fighters, police officers and emergency workers, helped him laugh for the first time and motivated him to return to his work.

"Laughter is like a salve," said Brenner. "You have got to find your laughter to get through these times."

Leslie Gales, chair of the board of UJA Federation, announced that Campaign 2006 would be co-chaired by Warren Kimel and Honey Sherman, and that Linda Frum would chair Women's Campaign and Advocacy.

Vitaly Baranovski loses second son in accident

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Daniel Olephir-Baranovski was very attached to his late half-brother, Matti. Although he was only five years old when Matti was beaten to death in 1999 in a North York park, Daniel was devastated.

The incident affected him so deeply that as he grew up, he became overly protective of his parents, calling them on the phone to make sure they were wearing their seatbelts, inquiring where they were and kissing them at every opportunity.

Daniel was killed early last week in a head-on collision on Dufferin Street in Vaughan. York Regional Police say the driver of an oncoming SUV lost control of the vehicle at the top of a hill, crossed into the oncoming lane and crashed into the Honda Civic driven by Daniel's father, Vitaly Baranovski, 45. As The CJN went to press, Vitaly was in serious condition in hospital with internal injuries.

Anyone with information about the accident is asked to call York police at 1-866-876-5423, ext. 7703, or Crime Stoppers at 1-800-222-TIPS.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, who officiated at Daniel's funeral, said the 10-year-old boy's death was a tragedy piled on top of another tragedy.

"How his father can deal with a second child's death, I don't know."

Rabbi Zaltzman said Vitaly's wife, Lilia Olephir, is keeping the news from Vitaly until his condition improves and he's able to handle the information.

Vitaly's oldest son, Matti, was killed in G. Ross Lord Park in November 1999 after he talked back to a gang of teens who demanded cigarettes. Last year, Meir Mariani and William "Lee" Cochrane were convicted of manslaughter and ordered to serve two years in addition to the time they had already spent in jail.

Daniel "was a very good student," Rabbi Zaltzman said. "He was very lively and he enjoyed parties, the occasion to celebrate. All the time, he did not forget Matti's loss. He was always nervous about his parents' safety."

Ever since Matti's death, Daniel "was missing him terribly," Rabbi Zaltzman said. "He was begging his mother to get him a younger brother and she had one two years ago.

"The child was mature enough to thank his mother for getting him a little brother."

One of Daniel's main interests was dance. He took dancing lessons on Sundays and afterwards his father would pick him up and drive them back to their Oak Ridges home north of Toronto. It was shortly after one of the dance lessons, as the Baranovskis drove on a wet and rainy day, that the accident occurred.

At the Windham Ridge Public School in Richmond Hill where Daniel was a Grade 5 student, students, teachers and staff were feeling "profound loss" at the news of his death, said Kim Tanaka, the school's principal.

"I can't describe it to you. We were in absolute shock," she said.

When news of Daniel's death reached Windham Ridge, the school quickly mobilized and a contingent of 20 students, 20 parents and 15 staff drove to Toronto for the funeral. Several of Daniel's classmates addressed the memorial service, recounting their memories about Daniel.

"They said he was always someone who could make you laugh, tell jokes," Tanaka said.

Daniel was remembered as someone who was athletic and loved handball games. He was involved in various aspects of school life and he was someone who was always positive, with a ready smile, she added.

"Our thoughts and prayers are focused on his mom, and hoping she does well, and that his dad pulls through," Tanaka said.

A few days after his death, the school gathered for a memorial service that featured a 10-minute video of Daniel's schoolmates talking about their friend.

Copies of the video will be distributed to members of his class and family. In addition, the school is considering other ways of memorializing Daniel, perhaps by planting a tree in Israel in his name or placing a commemorative plaque at the school, which would be dedicated in the spring, Tanaka said.

Meanwhile, Rabbi Zaltzman wrestled with the conundrum of why such a young boy lost his life. He was asked that question after the funeral and in answer, he cited a story involving the chassidic sage, the Baal Shem Tov.

"What we see is 10 years of a child. There's no explaining it. [To] the pain there is no limit.

"We must understand it in the life of a soul that has lived thousands of years and will live thousands of years more. The soul fulfils a mission and then is sent on a new mission," he said.

In death Daniel will remain close to Matti. Daniel was laid to rest in Pardes Shalom Cemetery, only a few metres away from his older brother.

Vaughan mall reverses decision on menorah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The management of Vaughan Mills shopping centre last week reversed an earlier decision and agreed to permit a menorah-lighting ceremony on the eighth and final day of Chanukah.

The move came after mall management acknowledged it had received customer complaints about its policy of excluding a menorah in the shopping centre.

Earlier, Vaughan Mills' management had cited a desire to remain neutral on matters of religious display when it turned down a request from Chabad Lubavitch to permit a menorah in one of the mall's public places.

That response prompted Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, rabbi at Chabad@Flamingo, to circulate an e-mail message to 1,800 recipients, calling for "a communal outcry" at the mall's decision. Its policy of rejecting a Chanukah display while allowing Christmas decorations was "at best an honest mistake or at worst an egregious example of the rising tide of global anti-Semitism," he wrote.

Kaplan said when he initially approached Vaughan Mills with the menorah request, "I didn't think it would be an issue. I thought it would be a no-brainer."

Other malls in the area had permitted menorahs and he had placed two in regional police headquarters, as well as one in the Vaughan Civic Centre, he said.

On the seventh day of Chanukah, Rabbi Kaplan received a call from Carol Hyams, general manager of Vaughan Mills, asking that he place a menorah in the mall. The next day, he and Hyams participated in a candle-lighting ceremony attended by about 60 people.

Rabbi Kaplan said he does not believe anti-Semitism played a role in the mall's original decision to turn down a menorah. "I'd like to think they came to realize it was an honest mistake, a bad marketing decision," he said.

Hope, optimism and reality

Last week, Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon expressed the hope that the coming year, 2005, would be "a year of great opportunity." Speaking at the fifth annual conference of the Inter-Disciplinary Centre of Herzliyah's Institute for Policy and Strategy, Sharon shone with cautious optimism as he turned his gaze to a hopeful future for Israelis, Palestinians and all peoples of the region.

"In 2005, we have the opportunity for an historic breakthrough in the relations between us and the Palestinians, a breakthrough for which we have waited many years." The reason for the renewed hope, it was not surprising to hear "was created following the death of Yasser Arafat."

"Now there is a real chance," Sharon continued, "that new Palestinian leaders will rise, those who will be elected, who will truly abandon the path of terror and instead will advance a strategy of reconciliation and negotiation without violence, terror and hatred."

Feelings of hope and of peaceful yearning were expressed by every main government official who addressed the conference last week. For example, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom urged all the parties to "do everything they can to ensure that this year [2005] will be the year of the moderates." Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz speculated that Arafat's death "could lead to a change in the entire region. New leaders could begin the change from an ethos of terror to one of coexistence and negotiation."

The hopes expressed by the Israeli leaders were but an earnest reflection of those held by their people. A poll conducted last week by Hebrew University's Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace found that 61 per cent of Israelis believe the death of Yasser Arafat has increased the chances for reaching a political settlement with the Palestinians. Interestingly, a poll conducted concurrently among the Palestinians by the Ramallah-based Palestinian Centre for Policy and Survey Research found that 53 per cent of Palestinians felt similarly optimistic.

But though hope and optimism are the inspirers of achievement, they nevertheless must always be tempered by reality and clarity of thought.

And in respect of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, reality always intrudes where optimism wants to linger.

Speaking from Qatar, Palestinian Authority leader Mahmoud Abbas immediately deflated Sharon's bubble of hope. He rejected all the underlying premises of Sharon's outline for a possible settlement by saying, among other things, that he "won't give up the right of his people's return to their homes."

As this is the last issue of The CJN in the calendar year of 2004, it is appropriate that we look to the new year that looms but seven days beyond the next sunset. But it is imperative that we do so with our feet firmly on the ground even as our hearts try to see past the familiar clouds that appear to be forming on the horizon.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Same-sex marriage

Thank you for Ron Csillag's balanced report of rabbinic responses to the Supreme Court's decision on the same-sex marriage reference ("Liberal rabbis welcome same-sex marriage finding," Dec. 16).

As a Jewish scholar, I hope that Rabbi David Novak might reconsider his most recent public attacks on the Jewish bona fides of Justice Minister Irwin Cotler and on gay Jews as a whole, whom he disingenously and speculatively accuses of hostile intent to target rabbis opposed to gay marriage for lawsuits.

In my view, such statements are disrespectful to the Jewish tradition and to the dignity and Jewish identity of all Jews, and are damaging to efforts to address escalating disaffiliation from Jewish life.

Canada's shift at UN is not promising

It has been reported that Canada's "promising" shift at the UN is seen by some as "demonstrating a renewed commitment to balance and even-handedness" by Canada ("Canada's shift at UN 'promising,'" CJN, Dec. 9). In fact, in the same article, Canada's ambassador to the UN Allan Rock admitted that Mideast resolutions are "divisive and lack balance."

On Dec. 1, Canada voted for five out of six anti-Israel resolutions tabled at the UN.

On Dec. 3, Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew clarified, for Parliament, Canada's "new" position regarding the use of UN resolutions exclusively against Israel. He said, "Our longstanding policy toward the Middle East has not changed... Our approach with these 22 resolutions is to assess them on their merits. This year, we have decided to change our vote on three of them." (Hansard)

It is shameful to see Canada cast its votes 19 out of 22 times against the only democracy in the Middle East, Israel.

For some to draw the conclusion that Prime Minister Paul Martin's government has taken a "promising" shift toward Israel is not just wishful thinking – it is plain wrong.

Save the Riverdale Shul

I am writing this letter because I am saddened by the news that the Riverdale Shul may have to close its doors ("Riverdale Shul in danger of closing," CJN, Dec. 9).

Toronto's Jewish community includes people who can meet their needs through membership in mainstream shuls as well as those whose needs are best met through involvement with alternative shuls. It is the responsibility of all Jews in Toronto to ensure that communities such as the Riverdale Shul are supported in their efforts to meet the needs of segments of our Jewish population.

It is unreasonable to think that alternative communities such as the Riverdale Shul can raise sufficient funds to support their activities. These communities are small and are frequently populated by people whose very alternative nature means that their personal financial resources might be limited.

If every synagogue in Toronto provided some support to the Riverdale Shul and if we contribute as much as we can, then I believe we will all have participated in the important mitzvah of supporting our community.

Everyone should visit Israel at least once

My wife and I recently returned from a tour of Israel. We had the most amazing time in that wonderful "little" country.

It is a place that everyone must visit at least once in a lifetime. Words cannot describe the feeling we had there. There was an excitement and a passion in the air that we have never experienced anywhere else.

We enjoyed our trip so much not only because we are Jews but also because the area is the cradle of civilization and you are really aware of that when you are there.

What Israelis have accomplished in 56 years is unbelievable. It makes me so proud to be a Jew and to be a part of what this land and people are about.

I cannot stress enough how important it is for all of us to visit here and feel the excitement and passion that this place exudes.

Kudos to Avrum – lover, matchmaker

I wish to thank Avrum Rosensweig ("Enter Avrum, lover and matchmaker," CJN, Nov. 11) for attempting to "spread the love." If each person, married or single, extended themselves to look out for the single people in this community, I believe we could assist in preventing the high rate of intermarriage. How many times have I heard, "I just couldn't find a nice Jewish man/woman"? Avrum's friend is lucky to have him advocating on her behalf.

I challenge each person in the Jewish community to try to play Eliezer the matchmaker and help at least one single person find his or her bashert. What a mitzvah. It's a "win-win" situation for all.

No Jews need apply

Part 1 was published last week. It dealt with the refusal to hire Jews in many areas of employment, ending with the example of a directive to employers from the National Selective Service – the federal agency responsible for coordinating the nation's military and civilian mobilization during World War II – not to ask if applicants are Jewish. The following is Part 2.

The National Employment Service (NES), which is the successor to the National Selective Service, asks no racial or religious questions on its cards, but according to one high official: "I'm not saying that the boys don't mark a little red X or something on a card if a man's Jewish." This doesn't necessarily mean that the NES employee is discriminating against Jews. He knows there are certain firms which will not consider Jewish applications and it would only cause the applicant embarrassment to be sent there and turned down.

This economic discrimination means that an important and gifted minority is being forcibly channelled into a narrow field of economic endeavour. There are Jewish stockbrokers operating in most cities, but in Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, no Jew holds a seat on the stock exchange.

Often, the easiest way out for a young member of the Jewish community, looking for a job as Norman Lyons did, and seeking some sort of security and a reasonable chance of promotion, is either to go into business for himself or to get a job with a Jewish firm. The Jew then often becomes accused of "clannishness" or of "taking over certain industries" (for example 21 per cent of all workers in the garment industry are Jewish), when actually he has been forced into these industries by a series of closed doors in others.

What is worse, the community slowly finds itself split in twain, divided by a well of segregation that can only lead to suspicion, mistrust and hate.

Segregation by race, at which Canadians are apt to look askance when it is practised in the southern United States, is just as strong in the Canadian social world as it is in the economic world. There are golf clubs which make no bones about the fact that they won't accept Jewish members; college fraternities and sororities which exclude Jewish students. Members of these clubs have argued that in private, social organizations they should be allowed to choose the people they associate with.

Nevertheless, we are tending toward a ghetto society, Canadian style, where Jew mixes only with Jew, gentile only with gentile. The Jews, barred from mixed companionship, must seek their own. In towns like Winnipeg and Toronto, they have set up or are setting up their own golf clubs. On most campuses they have had to organize their own fraternities – some of which won't accept gentiles.

Discrimination exists right across the social board. A Jewish boy applies for membership in a Manitoba ski club and gets refused when he admits his nationality is Jewish. A few months later, he makes a second application listing his nationality as Canadian. Then he's admitted. A Winnipeg woman who's a first-class tennis player applies for admission to a tennis club, stating she's Jewish. She's turned down, too. A week later, on a visit to friends in Vancouver, she writes the same club under the name of Betty McDonald. She gets an air-mail letter of acceptance a few days later.

Because of an Ontario precedent, it now appears to be perfectly legal for summer resort owners, at least, to sell property on the condition that it not be resold to persons of Jewish race or religion. This ruling – made last May by Mr. Justice Walter Schroeder – upheld a clause inserted by the Beach-O'-Pines Association at Grand Bend on Lake Huron into its real-estate agreement which technically makes it illegal for a real-estate owner in this area to invite a Jewish friend over for dinner. The Schroeder decision, which is being appealed, is all the more important because it at least partially negates a decision rendered by Mr. Justice J. Keller MacKay in 1944 which held that such a restrictive covenant in a real-estate agreement was null and void. The situation will remain clouded in Canada until the appeal to the Schroeder decision is heard. Meanwhile, there are still restrictive covenants. A federal member of Parliament for Ontario recently sold a piece of property under the written provision that it was not to be sold, rented or leased or used in any way other than for domestic service by Jews.

This sort of thing has already forced the establishment of all-Jewish summer resorts and is leading to a type of segregation which, though not as blatant as the Jim Crow style, can be just as dangerous.

Last summer, Maclean's made a random study of summer resorts in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes to find where they stood on accepting Jews.

Congress tested 48 summer resorts

Two letters were sent to each of 29 resorts – one under a gentile name of Marshall and the other under the name of Rosenberg. The Rosenberg letter was mailed half a day ahead of the Marshall letter so that if only one reservation were available, it would, under normal circumstances, go to Rosenberg.

Out of the 29 resorts tested in this manner, Marshall was able to make reservations for a two-week holiday in 21 cases. Rosenberg was able to make reservations in only 12 cases. Six resorts which didn't bother to answer Rosenberg made prompt reservations for Marshall. Six resorts told Rosenberg they were full up, but wrote Marshall offering him several choices of rooms and cabins.

A similar survey was undertaken in the summer of 1947 by the Canadian Jewish Congress in an effort to discover what, if anything, is meant by the terms "restricted clientele," "select clientele," "discriminating clientele," etc. Using the technique outlined above, and the names Lockwood and Greenberg, the congress tested 48 summer resorts in Ontario and Quebec which used restrictive phraseology, and 49 others that used no restrictive phrasing. The Jewish applicant was able to make reservations in only nine of the 48 "restricted" resorts while the gentile applicant made reservations in 46 instances. In the nonrestricted group, the Jewish applicant was able to make 27 reservations, the gentile applicant 47.

How extensive is anti-Semitism in Canada and is it increasing or decreasing? The only statistical indications to this are in the findings of the Gallup Poll. In January of 1943, a mid-war year, the poll asked people what nationalities they would oppose admitting into the Dominion as immigrants after the war. Forty-seven per cent of those questioned said they'd keep out Jews. This answer was all the more startling because it showed that Jews placed next to Germans and Japanese – who were our enemies at the time – as the most undesirable immigrants. The poll took a similar ballot in October of 1946. This time, 49 per cent of those questioned voted to keep out Jewish immigrants. And this time, the Jews placed second only to the Japanese as most undesirable in the opinion of "average" Canadians.

Where is anti-Semitism at its worst in Canada? Once again, the Gallup Poll provides the only statistical answer. On the immigration quiz, the most prejudice against Jewish immigrants was found in Quebec. The Maritimes were next, followed by Ontario, the Prairies and British Columbia in that order. (The spread between Quebec and B.C. was 67 to 30.) Another Gallup Poll, which asked whether Canadians favoured a fair employment practices code, showed the most discrimination in the Maritimes, with Quebec and Ontario a close second and third, British Columbia fourth and the Prairies showing the least discrimination.

There seems to be little relation then between the size of the Jewish population in a given area and that area's degree of anti-Semitism. Ontario's 66,000 Jews represent 1.84 per cent of her population. Quebec's 69,000 represent two per cent of her population. Manitoba's 19,000 represent 2.6 per cent. Manitoba, thus, has the highest per capita population of Jews, with Quebec second and Ontario third. Yet the poll shows Manitoba more tolerant than the other two. There is a low density of Jews in both the Maritimes and B.C. – one-half of one per cent or less – but those areas hold opposite views on discrimination.

A study of the 1941 census indicates that Jews have a better chance of getting certain jobs is Manitoba (department stores, nursing, teaching, etc.) than they have in Ontario and Quebec. Generally speaking, there seems to be less anti-Semitism in the west than there is in the east.

Perhaps the most disturbing factor in the anti-Semitism picture in Canada is the Social Credit Party, particularly its right wing, which calls itself the Douglas Social Credit Council in the west and the Union of Electors in Ontario and Quebec. This wing, which split away from the party proper last spring (anti-Semitism was said to be a factor), hews strictly to the line laid down by the founder of the Social Credit movement, Maj. C.H. Douglas.

Douglas' writings, which are still distributed by the Social Credit party proper, are violently anti-Semitic. In the 1933 edition of his book Social Credit, he attacks Jews and quotes from the infamous anti-Semitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion – a spurious document alleged to show a Jewish plot to conquer the world. In a more recent pamphlet, published in 1943 and entitled Program for the Third World War, Douglas announces that Columbus' discovery of America was a Jewish plot, that Hitler was really a Jew, that the Depression was caused by the Jews and that the Nazi pogroms against the Jews were actually started by the Jews themselves so they'd have an excuse not to fight in the war (which Douglas says they started).

The Douglasites' main line seems to be to blame the world's troubles on a set of international Jewish bankers which they are somehow able to identify with Soviet Communism. One of the leading subscribers to this line is Norman Jaques, MP for Wetaskiwin, Alta.

Pierre Berton

The official organ of Quebec's Union des Électeurs (which gained 113,258 votes in the July election to become that province's third most important political party) is Vers Demain, which recently published The Protocols of Zion in serial form. The Ontario paper is called Voice of the Electors. It runs articles with titles such as "Anti-Semitic Whining." Last April, this paper published an article by John Patrick Gilleso who told his readers: "When you hear of ordinary politicians smeared as fascist, anti-Semitic, etc., you may generally believe that those men are your friends."

Although the Social Credit Government in Alberta has soft-pedalled vocal anti-Semitism, in 1947, it banned in its schools two motion pictures dealing with racial questions. One was the U.S. army film, Don't Be a Sucker, a warning against racial and religious prejudices, and the other was a British Ministry of Information film, Man One Family, a plea for racial understanding.

There is every indication then, that despite all the recent talk about anti-Semitism, despite the general lip service paid to the principle that it is vicious, there is still a lot of it around.

The society that kept Norman Lyons, the accountant, pounding the pavements vainly looking for a job to do in the midst of a war designed to wipe out the very attitudes that drove members of his race into a Belsen isn't any kinder to his younger brother three years after the war is ended.

The wall of segregation which today keeps the Greenbergs estranged from the Peabodys is as high as ever. And like all walls, it can cripple the freedom of men on both sides of it. Until it comes down, it stands in the way of both Jew and Gentile – a stubborn and ugly barrier blocking the pathway to the good life.

Post-halachic Judaism

The late Emil Fackenheim, the famous philosopher, often attended Sabbath services at an Orthodox synagogue in Toronto. When he heard something from the pulpit he wanted to remember, he wrote it down. Though comfortable with Jewish tradition, he did not live according to Halachah (Jewish law), which forbids writing on the Sabbath.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

He was something of a post-halachic Jew: respectful of Jewish law yet heeding its precepts only selectively. For many Jews, the polarities of earlier generations – either total commitment to Halachah or total rejection of it – have become irrelevant, as has the, often arbitrary, distinction between observant and non-observant Jews.

I have come across many Jews of Fackenheim's kind, both here and in Israel. If they attend Orthodox synagogues, it may be for the liturgy more than the discipline. Prudent rabbis look the other way so as not to alienate them.

I see this as a sign of the acceptance of post-halachic Judaism: rabbis and cantors of different persuasions ministering to Jews for whom Halachah has ceased to be normative, but for whom tradition matters. All movements in contemporary Judaism, except haredim, seem to be moving in that direction.

As a result, Jews who are now less and less under pressure to conform find their way to synagogues sometimes to pray, but more often to celebrate life cycle events or study. Even those who remain staunchly Orthodox usually do so as a matter of free choice, not out of habit or social pressure. Others often choose synagogues not according to religious allegiance but according to where they feel most at home.

Rather than bemoan the lack of theological clarity and halachic consistency, there are reasons to celebrate these seeming shortcomings, for parallel dynamics across denominational divides could reduce tensions and make for unity.

That is definitely so in the Diaspora, where the challenges that face Jews require common platforms, not senseless divisions. But even in Israel, where one denomination still has the power to impose practices on the whole population, Orthodoxy's clout is diminishing. The country's proposed constitution promises to further curtail halachic coercion and thus make it easier for Jews to live with their inconsistencies.

This need not mean that Orthodoxy is losing out, only that while its adherents will have every opportunity to practise their ways, manifestations of post-halachic Judaism will not be curtailed. Freedom thus won will strengthen Judaism, for it promises a new kind of cohesiveness, based not on intimidation but on appreciation of all aspects of Judaism, including Halachah.

Even if defenders of the denominational apparatus see this as a loss, there is much to suggest that the Jewish people as a whole will regard it as a gain, for it promises a move from adolescent belligerence to mature coexistence.

The West begins to feel included

The most common response elicited from my announcement that I had been accepted to and would be attending Simon Fraser University in British Columbia was a look of utter confusion. Many of my Jewish friends and family must have been expecting I would choose McGill, Western or York, and most had simply never heard of SFU.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

Those initial reactions foreshadowed the sense of isolation that I, like other Jewish students here at SFU and at other campuses in Western Canada have felt. But things might just be changing.

Despite the feeling of being distant from what seems like the centre of Canadian Jewish life in the East, I am excited about the recent developments and nationwide interest in opening the lines of communication and nationalizing the Canadian Jewish student experience.

I remember my first year here, when my friends from schools around Ontario would get excited about the next big party hosted by any of the campuses' Jewish Students Associations or chapters of Alpha Epsilon Pi, the Jewish fraternity. It seemed to me that a regional Jewish student community had been formed – one that provided social and romantic opportunities – and I became acutely aware that a similar sense of community was missing among Jewish students in Western Canada.

The feeling of isolation was intensified as I experienced the campaign of anti-Israel propaganda that occurred at SFU during that first year. I had heard about the now-famous incidents at Concordia and York universities, but it seemed that nobody out East knew what was happening here. When I talked to the other Canadian delegates at the 2003 Hillel International Student Leaders Assembly in Honesdale, Penn., they were genuinely surprised at my accounts of the vocabulary and intimidation being used at SFU in debates about Israel.

At that conference, we Canadians discussed both the circumstantial and the very real differences between American and Canadian campuses, as well as how much we could all benefit from a network of Canadian Jewish students.

Since then, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) has been founded and has already begun addressing the needs of Canadian students from across the country. The scope of representation of that body was extended by my recent appointment to the position of communications chair on an executive committee made up of students from several different universities.

I am optimistic that CFJS will help fill many of the voids in Jewish advocacy and programming and provide the kind of opportunities and services that we in the West have been missing. Without a formal communications network, Jewish students and Jewish student groups in the West and across the country have not been able to get and give advice on ways to deal with problems that arise on our campuses. We haven't been able to share programming ideas, and we haven't been able to create the social networks conducive to meeting other Jewish young people.

We hope the intercampus relationships fostered by CFJS will create a dynamic flow of fresh ideas, advice and new perspectives on the student level.

As a Western Canadian Jewish student, I am already excited about two upcoming CFJS conferences. The first is a national conference to be held in Montreal, called ONE, which will unite Canadian Jewish students, foster national and local leadership and allow hundreds and hundreds of people sharing the identity and experience of being a Jewish student in Canada to learn and party together. There is a huge buzz surrounding ONE in the West, as we students who have felt neglected in the past look forward to inclusion in the national community.

The second conference will address the unique experiences, needs and interests of Jewish students in Western Canada. To be held in Calgary, this conference is inspiring us as a result of the high level of input from students representing campuses from University of Manitoba west. It underscores the value of a student-run national organization and will help us create the kind of community in the West that students on campuses in the rest of the country have.

Hopefully, by facilitating dialogue with and including large and small campuses from across the country, CFJS will help make Jewish students, even those on campuses where Jews don't usually go in large numbers, feel like part of a vibrant, active and proud Canadian community of Jewish students.

Jewish students can sign up to receive e-mails from CFJS by sending one to: JewishStudentsCanada-subscribe@yahoogroups.com

The end is in sight

Recently, a friend of mine wondered aloud why we had to bother with fourth year. Although it's the time of university life when, at least theoretically, you take your hardest courses – and when you scramble to finish your honours thesis using all the knowledge you've acquired in the previous three years – through it all, an ever-present voice in the back of your head is constantly saying, "None of this really matters."

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Right now, that voice is screaming at me as I try to finish my last two essays of the semester. I just received word that I've been admitted to law school – and to my first choice of schools at that. So while I care about maintaining my academic record and reputation, I nevertheless feel a dwindling sense of motivation.

Of course, university is supposed to teach you to love learning for its own sake. Your university years are a time of exploration and discovery that allow you to think freely about esoteric theories and engage in debates that may have little or no relevance in the real world.

For the forward-thinking student, however, an undergraduate education is also a means to an end. It lays the foundation for even higher education, which in turn leads to employment and self-sufficiency. (Last time I checked, the demand for undergraduate philosophers in the "real world" was zero).

Post-secondary education is, in some respects, a game. As much as it's about learning and acquiring skills, it's about getting the grades to get you where you need to go. And, as anyone who has been to university will tell you, quality of learning does not necessarily correspond to grades received.

So, as my fourth year of university chugs along, I can safely say that at this point, I know how to analyze a piece of philosophy and I know how to write a paper and how to give a presentation. But it's difficult to summon the kind of motivation that carried me through my first three years. With my future presumably set, it's extraordinarily difficult to keep my eyes on the present.

So, I sit in front of my computer for hours on end going through the motions of writing my end-of-term papers. Without enough time to really engage in what I'm doing, I feel like a zombie moving from one subject to the next – from Derrida to Heidegger to Nietzsche – while counting the days until I can head home to relax.

Of course, over the break, I have a thesis to write, then I head right back to school and more books and papers.

If I had the option of skipping my final semester altogether, I would. But I don't have that choice. So, assuming that my professors aren't going to be giving away any get-out-of-school-free cards, I'm considering how to approach the end of my undergraduate years.

Maybe when I'm freed from the immediate pressure of worrying about what lies ahead, I can learn for the sake of learning. Or, more importantly, perhaps I will be able to revel in the luxuries of undergraduate life.

It's hard to believe how quickly this phase of my life has flown by. It's so easy to get caught up in the deadlines and work that make the days go slowly, but once I lift my head to get a broader view, I realize how quickly each week, month and semester has passed.

While the urge to think ahead to next year is strong – and while the excitement and nervousness about living in a new city, engaging in new studies and meeting new people can hardly be suppressed – I am actually looking forward to the next four months. They will let me enjoy the pleasures (and last stresses) of my undergraduate years. Besides, they will be over before I know it.

Jewish Life

No dogs or Jews allowed

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Pierre Berton's article "No Jews need apply," which originally appeared in Maclean's in November 1948 and was reprinted in last week's and in this week's CJN, offered a penetrating look at the discreet, country-club-style anti-Semitism that was rife in Canadian society.

Berton, who died last month, pointed out that people with names such as Greenberg were frequently denied job interviews, promotions, hotel and country-club reservations and the right to live in certain neighbourhoods. He was one of a growing number of civil libertarians in the postwar era who produced a rash of books, movies, articles, plays and radio broadcasts, among them Gentleman's Agreement, Crossfire and Earth and High Heaven.

A computer-assisted search of Toronto newspapers of the 1930s and '40s highlights the prevalence of discrimination in those times. As the following examples suggest, the prejudice was sometimes quite blatant, yet was entirely legal.

"Alderman's ban labelled insult to Jewish race" was the headline of a story in the Toronto Star of June 16, 1932. The piece centred around Robert Siberry, a city alderman who was preparing to open Bangor Lodge, a summer hotel whose advertising circulars stipulated, "Patronage exclusively gentile."

When Siberry invited the city council to the opening, two Jewish alderman, John Glass and future mayor Nathan Phillips, publicly protested. Other aldermen also voiced disapproval of Siberry's "indiscreet" advertising; the council had unanimously censured a local firm for similar public statements about a year before. Toronto's mayor, W.J. Stewart, also declined to attend, although he preferred not to disclose his reason. "This is not the time to raise controversial issues," he told the Star.

Sam Factor, a former alderman who had become an MP, expressed surprise "that a genial Irishman like Bob Siberry would show such prejudice. I thought that kind of prejudice had subsided, but apparently it crops up every once in a while. I certainly condemn his action."

A parallel episode reared its ugly head the following winter. "Toronto Jewry incensed at proposed island ban," screamed a headline in the Toronto Star on Feb. 24, 1933. William J. Sutherland, a rooming-house operator on Centre Island, was "calling on island residents to unite 'in keeping out undesirables such as Jews and indiscreet young folks.'" As Jewish leader A. B. Bennett noted, Sutherland's property had been marked with blatant "Gentiles only" signage for years.

"Improper and unjustified" is how B'nai Brith representative J. L. Oelbaum described the proposed ban. "Unless the Jews are breaking the law, they have as much right on the island as anyone. The authorities should prevent the agitation going further and should prohibit these 'Only gentiles allowed' signs.

"If the Jews are breaking the law, it is time for the authorities – not some individual – to step in. But agitations like this should be squelched at once."

Half a year later, the mayor came to much the same conclusion.

That spring and summer, newspapers carried regular reports of the rising tide of restrictions and persecutions against the Jews in Germany, where Hitler had recently taken power.

In superficial sympathy with the Nazis, some east-end residents formed a "Swastika Club" in the hope of keeping the city's Jews from using the local public beach. City newspapers gave detailed reports of the clashes that occurred there in August 1933.

The so-called Swazis soon moved onto Jewish turf and unfurled a large swastika flag during a baseball game in the park at Christie Pits. Scores were injured in the famous riot that ensued. The episode is recounted in a work of historical non-fiction – Cyril Levitt's The Riot at Christie Pits – as well as in Karen X. Tulchinsky's recent novel The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky.

The day after the riot, the mayor prohibited any display of the swastika within the city of Toronto.

The great Rabbi Bengio of Tangiers

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

In Morocco, religion – meaning Islam, but also Judaism – was officially sanctioned by the king. That is to say, every jurisdiction would have an appointed individual who would represent the court of the king in matters of religion. The position was a powerful one. The individual would act as a registrar in matters of birth, marriage and death. He also could levy taxes, have the police at his disposal, incarcerate people, and, in some instances, even mete out corporal punishment. He would also adjudicate and oversee matters of kashrut.

In 1856, the chief rabbi of Tangiers, Rabbi Joseph Bengio, died. Rabbi Abner Ha'Serfati of Fez, the chief rabbi for all of Morocco, sent a letter to Rabbi Yitzchak Bengualid of Tetuan instructing him to appoint a new chief rabbi for Tangiers. This individual, Rabbi Bengualid was told, had to meet all of the relevant criteria, but he also had to be chosen from among the natives of the city.

Dutifully, Rabbi Bengualid travelled to Tangiers for the task. The distance between the two cities is a mere 60 kilometres, but in those days, on the back of a donkey with no roads to speak of, it was a two-day trek.

Upon arrival, the rabbi made his way directly to the synagogue, which also served as a house of study. Of course, everybody rose to greet this distinguished guest. Rabbi Bengualid requested that they all immediately resume their studies and simply allow him to listen in. After a time, Rabbi Bengualid asked for the group's attention. "I have been sent to choose from among you the new chief rabbi for the district," he told them. "I hereby appoint Rabbi Mordechai Bengio to the position."

Rabbi Bengio was all of 28 years old. His protests that he was unworthy and much too young for such a position were ignored. Rabbi Bengualid returned to his duties in Tetuan and the young Rabbi Bengio became the chief rabbi of Tangiers, a position he held until his death in 1918.

Rabbi Bengio presided at a time when Tangiers grew in importance as a centre of commerce and as a gateway to Europe and the entire Mediterranean Basin. For 62 years, he was the absolute and sole authority in all matters of Jewish religion for Tangiers. And for his entire term, he turned over all his salary to the community, never once accepting any money for holding the position.

He was called on to settle disputes, which he did in a most fair and impartial manner. Jews and Muslims alike venerated Rabbi Bengio. Once, with the help of corrupt officials, a Jew had obtained false certificates and swindled a Muslim, who approached Rabbi Bengio. The rabbi was able to see through the ruse and ruled in favour of the Muslim man.

Rabbi Bengio was staunch and fearless and never shy to express his opinion. Only once during his tenure did he succumb to external pressures.

The French authorities had put pressure on the Muslim authorities to in turn pressure the rabbi to issue a get, a bill of divorce. A divorce in those days was very rare and always scandalous. Under extreme and unrelenting pressure and against his better judgment, Rabbi Bengio issued the get. This divorce was for a man of great influence who lived in the city of Oran, Algeria.

This caused Rabbi Bengio much anxiety and after a sleepless night, he instructed his son to send a telegram declaring the divorce papers to be invalid.

When his son arrived at the post office to send the telegram, there was quite a commotion. Word had just arrived that the boat carrying the divorce papers sank in a storm.

The new gluttony

Gluttony: The Seven Deadly Sins* by Francine Prose, Oxford University Press.

This slim volume is part of a lecture and book series on the seven deadly sins sponsored by the New York Public Library.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Francine Prose, a well-known author and editor, skilfully blends history, religious doctrine, literature, art and popular culture in her well-rounded approach to a many-sided subject.

Who in the world first decided that gluttony was a sin? Whom exactly does it harm except for the gluttons themselves? Admittedly, the act and the physical consequences of gluttony can be intensely unattractive. But the sin is not nearly so esthetically unappealing as, say, the more repugnant spectacles of sloth, avarice and envy. Nor is gluttony so plainly dangerous as pride and anger, which can so easily lead to discord, violence and social chaos.

These days, few people seriously consider the idea that eating too much or enjoying one's food is a crime against God, a profound moral failure for which we will be promptly dispatched to hell. It's doubtful that even devoutly religious persons are likely to seek absolution for looking forward to breakfast, or having taken pleasure in the delights of last night's dinner.

"Yet," writes Prose, "even as gluttony has ceased to be a spiritual transgression, food, the regulation of eating, and the related subjects of dieting, obesity, nutrition, etc., have become major cultural preoccupations. A casual survey of the self-help section of the local bookstore will make it clear how large a place gluttony (in its new, deconsecrated form) now occupies in our collective consciousness."

As a television comedian put it, "We can understand why the two questions most asked by Americans are: Where can I park, and how can I lose weight? Eating and drinking to excess cause many of our diseases and infirmities. As a lamp is choked by too much oil and fire is extinguished by too much wood, so the natural health of the body is destroyed by too much food."

Maimonides warned, "Do not believe that much eating or drinking… enlarge the understanding – the opposite is true." And Rav Sadia Gaon declared, "The glutton is like a dog that is never satisfied. He becomes disgusting to everyone."

Paradoxically, for all its abhorrence of tiny weight gains and minuscule accretions of body fat, our culture is fixated on identifying the trendiest restaurants in town. What results is often the phenomenon of wealthy people eating tiny portions. It is no wonder that visitors from developing countries are often confused by the fact that in North America, the rich are more likely to look thin, while the poor tend toward overweight.

It is widely believed that compulsive eaters have problems such as low self-esteem or a history of family abuses. They are trying to fill some emotional void by binging on massive quantities of often unhealthy and fattening foods. In our culture, gluttony is now a medical issue or a social sin.

Indeed, a predisposition to obesity can come from genetics or an imbalance of body chemistry.

The author concludes her overview of a complex subject with these words, "One thing seems clear: the broad shiny face of the glutton has been – and continues to be – the mirror in which we see ourselves, our hopes and fears, our darkest dreams, and deepest desires."

Israel's modern currency

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Presidents, prime ministers and poets – they are the elite of Israeli society. And their portraits can be yours to hang on a wall or carry in your pocket. Israel's modern currency tells the story of the evolution of the country by depicting its heroes and its symbols, new and old. And since the country and its currency are always changing, you can keep up on the latest developments on the web.

The Bank of Israel has put together an extremely impressive site, particularly in the area devoted to Israel notes and coins. You get a concise, illustrated history of the evolution of money this century, from the Palestine pound and prutot to Israeli pounds and agarot to the hyper-inflation that ushered in shekels and finally new shekels. [www.bankisrael.gov.il/catal/catale.htm]

Along the way, there are some fascinating anecdotes. On the eve of the establishment of the country, banknotes could not be printed locally since the British Mandate had not yet expired and because of the lack of local expertise. At the same time, foreign firms did not want to print money for a non-existent state. Eventually, the American Banknote Company of New York was persuaded to help. But in order to get approval from the U.S. State Department to print foreign banknotes, the notes could give no indication that they were "legal tender." That phrase had to be printed onto the bills later. [www.bankisrael.gov.il/catal/angl.htm]

When the notes were printed, the name of the new country hadn't yet been decided, so the phrase "Palestine Pound" was used on the notes (as it had been during the mandate). The banknotes reached the country secretly in July 1948 and went into circulation the following month. It wasn't until the country was four years old that it had its own "Israel Pounds." You can read about – and view – early coins and banknotes of the British Mandate of Palestine at the informative page created by Howard M. Berlin. [http://tinyurl.com/3u7uo]

Although many Israeli coins feature traditional motifs such as menorahs or olive branches, that doesn't mean you won't find contemporary themes on them, too. Coins have been minted to mark the International Chess Olympiad, the International Harp Competition and in 1962, to commemorate the Shavit, the Israeli meteorological rocket. [http://tinyurl.com/53tru] And recently, the Bank of Israel issued a coin to celebrate Israel's 2004 windsurfing delegation to the Olympics. [www.commem.com/prod37.htm]

Many coins minted in Israel are not legal tender but have been created to honour a personality or a celebrity. The Israel Government Coins & Medals Corporation has released a framed medal of Rembrandt's The Jewish Bride, a keychain with the likeness of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, as well as reproductions of the works of Chagall, Pissarro and Shalom of Safed. [www.coins.co.il/]

Did you return from your last trip to Israel with local bills you didn't have time to exchange? They're probably OK, but you may want to read up on how to protect yourself from counterfeit Israeli bills in circulation. Look for watermarks, security threads, microtext and my favourite – two triangles printed on both sides of the bill that when held up to a light form a perfect Magen David. [http://tinyurl.com/4oncv]

Israel's current set of banknotes has been around for six years and carries portraits of former prime minister Moshe Sharett and writer Shmuel Yosef Agnon as well as former president Zalman Shazar on the highest denomination in circulation, the 200 new Israel shekel bill. A 500 new Israel shekel banknote will be added in the future. The next personality to be honoured: Yitzhak Rabin. [http://tinyurl.com/44ptx]

If you happen to have a drawer full of older banknotes that were withdrawn from circulation in 2000 – carrying the likenesses of Maimonides and former prime ministers Levi Eshkol and Golda Meir – don't worry. You can exchange them for crisp new ones at any branch of the Bank of Israel until the end of 2005.

Tradition versus liberalism discussed at USCJ meeting

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Halachic pluralism (defined as more than one legitimate way of observing Jewish law), inclusion of youth in synagogue life, and feelings of alienation among those in smaller communities were key issues discussed at the recent weekend convention of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), Canadian region.

While some of the more than 100 participants, representing communities across Ontario and as far east as Halifax, said they gained deeper knowledge of what Conservative Judaism means, challenges were apparent in a panel featuring rabbis Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Steven Saltzman, titled "Can we decide, and not divide?"

Referring to the inclusion of women in synagogue ritual – which varies significantly from one Conservative synagogue to another – Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, said he thinks there is value in the idea that life is not always clear.

Judy Yudof, the Texas-based president of USCJ, said Conservative Jews "sometimes allow other movements to say they're more authentic," but she denied that this is the case.

Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where the meeting was held, addressed the issue of whether Conservative Judaism is halachic, in his Saturday morning sermon.

"The answer is a clear yes!" stated the rabbi, who is president of the Rabbinical Assembly – Ontario region. He spoke of a long history of halachic pluralism, dating back to Hillel and Shammai, and defended its validity in a movement in which many synagogues provide full egalitarianism, while others – including the majority in Toronto – hew to more traditional standards.

Rabbi Saltzman, of Adath Israel Congregation, expressed the opposite view. If a current study by the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards on the halachic status of homosexual behaviour results in the ordination of openly gay rabbis or in "consecration ceremonies" for same-sex couples, it will be "the last nail in the coffin of any facade that this movement is halachic," he said.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Rabbi Howard Morrison

One of his congregants asked whether there is room for traditional Conservative synagogues within the movement, citing a dearth of males graduating as cantors, and recent publications that he said were "not any good" to traditional congregations. "People don't know that Conservative Jews are expected to be observant."

Rabbi Saltzman said egalitarians "are playing a risky game with the future." He said that people who have left his synagogue for egalitarian congregations return for the daily minyan, which he said egalitarian synagogues are less likely to be able to provide.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl did not agree that the movement, by increasing women's participation, has veered from tradition. At his synagogue, which does have a daily minyan, women may have aliyot, but they are not included in the minyan.

He said, however, that the two synagogues have much more in common than not.

Rabbi Saltzman said his congregation has much less in common with the Conservative congregation his brother attends in Massachusetts, which is so liberal that it allows videotaping of Shabbat morning bar and bat mitzvahs, and music at the reception, as long as it is Hebrew music.

An attendee whose son-in-law is not Jewish raised the issue of intermarriage, asking for an across-the-board policy statement about the inclusion of intermarried couples. "This is becoming a bigger and more important issue for all of us."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl's approach once an intermarriage has taken place – typical of that of most of his Conservative colleagues here – is to "find a place for the Jewish partner, and to enable the non-Jewish partner to come for the High Holidays, because that's the only time tickets are an issue… We want to build bridges to [non-Jewish spouses] because hopefully we can bring them over the line into the Jewish community." He acknowledged, however, that it doesn't always happen that way.

Rabbi Saltzman said his congregation is probably the only Conservative one in North America to ask members to leave if they marry a non-Jew. "In the end, they have to respect our decision to build a community of Jews married to Jews [and] raising Jewish children." They would be welcomed "with open arms" if there is a decision to convert, he said.

Yudof said that while United Synagogue would never encourage outmarriage, she would like to hold out hope that such marriages "can result in beautiful Jewish families."

Another issue in the movement, raised by former United Synagogue Youth (USY) regional president David Goldberg, is that "young, dedicated and halachic Conservative Jews are becoming Orthodox, because we cannot provide proper communities. It is time for the leaders in our movement to start looking for these teens and bring them into our already existing communities," he said.

As an example, he mentioned a university student who had been welcomed by an Orthodox rabbi who provided her with a place to stay for Shabbat and ritual items such as a chanukiyah, but who had not experienced anything similar within her Conservative community.

Tamara Kochberg, USCJ Canadian region youth director, said if the leadership demonstrates that youth are at the centre of the synagogue by involving them in new ways, congregants will follow suit.

She also noted that when youth are involved in programs or synagogue services, parents become involved as well. The best example, she said, is her father, Paul Kochberg, now president of the region.

Goldberg also expressed the need to build Conservative synagogues in areas like Thornhill where there are many Conservative families. The area currently has only one synagogue affiliated with the movement.

Yudof indicated she would follow up on that issue.

Clarification

The story "Liberal Rabbis Welcome Same-Sex Marriage Ruling" (CJN, Dec. 16) may have left the impression that the Toronto Board of Rabbis is for Conservative, Reform or Reconstructionist rabbis only. In fact, it is open for membership to all rabbis, regardless of affiliation.

Mall allows menorah

"I have no intention of tarring them with the label of anti-Semitism. I don't think it would be fair."

Hyams said Vaughan Mills is "trying to respond to the needs of our community. We're growing and learning. We're the new kid on the block."

Vaughan Mills tried to position itself as a "non-denominational, neutral entity in the community," Hyams said.

Santa decorations are seen as cultural in nature. There are no Christmas trees, wreaths or angels in the display, she added.

Hyams and Rabbi Kaplan said they expect a menorah will be in the mall starting with the first day of Chanukah next year.

Withdrawal opponents show solidarity with settlers

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Opponents of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to pull settlers out of the Gaza Strip and part of the West Bank expressed their support for Jewish settlers in the territories in a recent event presented by the Toronto Zionist Council.

Broadcast live on Israel National Radio from Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, the evening's theme, "It's Your Land," emphasized solidarity, strength and celebration of the Gush Katif settlement in Gaza, home to 8,000 Jewish settlers.

"We will not give away our land of Israel and you must help us in our battle," said Rachel Saperstein, a Gush Katif resident who called in from Israel. "We remain strong while the Sharon government shows weakness."

About 200 people attended the program, which featured music by the Gush Katif band, Maarava Mikan, two films and opinions on the disengagement plan from talk show host Tovia Singer and Israeli Brig.-Gen. (Ret) Tzvi Fogel.

The event also united a Jewish and a Christian family struggling with grief, as David Hatuel, a Gush Katif resident whose pregnant wife and four daughters were killed by Palestinian terrorists, met with Marc Woerlen, a Pelham, Ont., man who lost his wife and seven children in a farmhouse fire in November.

"We learn from the Maccabees that even if the situation looks desperate, we always have to have faith and hope," Hatuel said, speaking through a translator. "This is the way to win and continue."

"Suffering and pain sometimes brings people together," Rabbi Stern said. "Marc and David are two people of different faiths... but when they met, they fell on each other's shoulders and wept. As I said, tragedy, pain and suffering knows no boundaries."

The disengagement plan calls for the removal in 2005 of all 21 Jewish settlements in Gaza, as well as four from the West Bank.

Fogel, a former chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces' Southern Command, said he does not expect the plan to become a reality in the near future, if at all.

"The pullout is not going to happen, at least not in the two years to come," Fogel said. "I believe leaders do not change their ways... [Sharon is] not going to give up [the land].

"When he will see with whom we are dealing with, he will stop, I am sure," Fogel added.

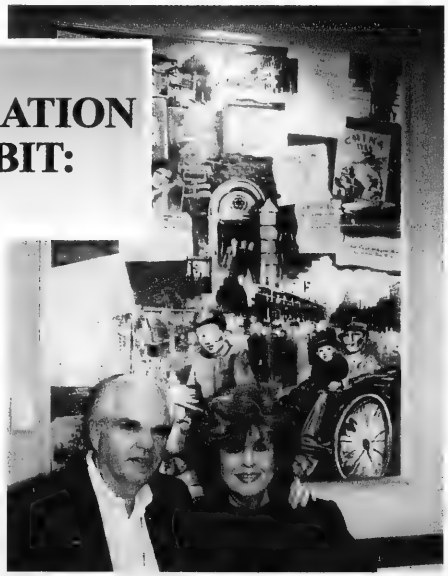
A film called Gush Katif Forever was presented during the evening. It juxtaposed Gush Katif's thriving agricultural businesses and beachside vistas with images of mortar attacks and shootings.

The film also highlighted clips of Sharon speaking strongly in support of the settlers in 2001.

"You can live in your country and be in exile," Rabbi Stern said. "This exile of Jews in their own land must and will come to an end."

The rabbi added that he is planning a solidarity trip to Gush Katif and other settlements for February 2005.

IMMIGRATION EXHIBIT:



On Dec. 5, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care celebrated the opening of "Lech Lecha/Go Forth," a mixed-media exhibit by Toronto artist Ian Leventhal that's being shown in the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged's community hall. Tracing five streams of Jewish immigration, the exhibit tells the stories of families who now make Toronto their home. It consists of five panels in wood, paint, sculpture, collage and photography, representing the Ashkenazi, Indian, Sephardi, Chinese and Caribbean Jewish experiences. Seen here are Sandra and Harry Fiedler. Harry was born in Shanghai and many of his photographs and family documents are incorporated into the Chinese panel.

Tory wants to reinstate private school tax credit

John Tory – lawyer, businessman, political strategist – won the leadership of Ontario's Progressive Conservative party in September, capping years of political activism. Now 50, he joined the Ontario Young Progressive Conservative Association at age 15. Over the ensuing years, he managed several municipal, provincial and federal campaigns, and in 1981, he was named principal secretary to then premier Bill Davis. Since then, he's served as president and CEO of Rogers Cable and as commissioner of the Canadian Football League, among many professional accomplishments. Last year, he ran unsuccessfully for mayor of Toronto, but the campaign raised his public profile considerably. For the PC leadership, he positioned himself as a pragmatist who wants to move the party away from the right-wing agenda of former premier Mike Harris.

CJN: Recently, you said you would put tax credits for private schools "back on the agenda." Would you reinstate the Equity in Education Tax Credit?

Tory: The answer to that is yes, but... I intend to engage in a broad process of consultation, both within my own party and outside it, with people who have children in independent schools, with educators, [and] with members of my party, to frankly improve the policy. I thought it was far too easy for the government, politically, to get away with simply abolishing the policy that had been thought through and put in place a couple of years earlier. Not only that, but they abolished it retroactively, which is a very unusual thing to be able to do... [Premier Dalton] McGuinty was able to very substantially deceive and mislead the people into believing two things: one, that this was somehow about private schools for wealthy people and their children, and two, that the existence of such a credit, as opposed to addressing a fairness issue, was going to do terrible harm to the public school system.

Both of those things are demonstrably false. First of all, most of the people who benefitted from the tax credit before [were] very average, middle-class Canadians who are, in many cases, struggling to send their children to independent schools. And secondly, we don't believe that the existence of such a tax credit will in any way put a strain on the public school system. In fact, while a tax credit does cost money, if you look at the cost to taxpayers of having to staff public schools in order to take back all the kids who [would leave] independent schools, it would cost well in excess of the money that was projected to be spent on the education tax credit.

Specifically, I have said that I want our party to consider two important changes to the policy [that would] improve it. The first was to income test it to ensure that more support went to those with lower income. That's not to say anybody would get nothing, but you would tilt support a bit toward those who made less money. The second change was to really focus on accountability and to make sure that curriculum and teaching qualifications met the highest standards.

CJN: Would you limit a tax credit to faith-based schools only?

Tory: No, I don't think so. I think this is something on which I'd want to reach out and get comments from both the membership of my party and the community at large. I think the fairness argument applies more explicitly to faith-based schools because there's one set of faith-based schools under our Constitution that are fully funded [– Roman Catholic ones]. I think it then becomes just as difficult to say, "Fine, we're going to fund all independent schools that are faith-based and not supply some tax credit for parents [of children] in schools which are not faith-based."

CJN: Is a tax credit the way to go? Can you foresee another way to alleviate the strain on parents?

Tory: It's interesting you should ask. During the leadership campaign, I talked about ways in which you might make sure that these schools had access to high standards of technology that were available to students in other schools. I talked about textbooks. It's a constant struggle for Canadian publishers to sell their textbooks. It's also a struggle for schools to keep up-to-date textbooks. So, I think there are ways in which you could help these schools make sure they have access to the best technology and the best school books. I don't know whether you do that instead of, or in addition to, a tax credit. This is what I want to consult the party and the community on... which would include the Jewish, Muslim and independent Christian communit[ies].

CJN: Under your two immediate predecessors, the party drifted rightward. You ran and won largely as a centrist. How can you return the party to where you can challenge the McGuinty government from the political middle?

Tory: Where the political middle is has changed over time. I think as time passes, we're seeing that [the Liberals], while they try to pretend they're in the political middle are, in fact, not. They try to pretend that they were fiscal conservatives. Of course, they've proven, in the first year alone, that they're anything but. They're on a spending spree that's almost unparalleled in the history of Ontario. They brought in the single biggest tax increase in the history of Ontario. They've indicated they won't balance their books until the fourth year of their mandate, which to me is not an indication of a government that's really serious about its budget.

New Ontario PC leader wants to reach out to Jews

I think people are looking for a more conservative approach to the management of their money. I think they're tired of paying more and getting less. In that respect, it will be easy to distinguish us from them when the next election comes.

Number one, we are going to make a very significant effort to reach out to people who weren't a part of our party previously, not because we kept them out, but because we didn't reach out. And number two, the same regionally. We have two regions of the province where we have no seats: Northern Ontario and Toronto. Between those two regions, that's 33 seats, of which we hold zero. I've already started to spend quite a bit of time reaching out to those parts of the province and begin the process of winning them back.

CJN: Do you think the party has done a good job reaching out to the Jewish community and if not, how would you change that?

Tory: I've had a long association with [the Jewish community] over the years. Do I think we spend enough time listening to that community and inviting [it] to be part of our party? To be frank, no. But that's not necessarily meant as much to be criticism of any previous leader or administration as it is a challenge to me to do better and to say, "This is a community from which I can learn a lot as a political leader." I want to have people feeling I have reached out and understood their concerns about the issues. And I intend to do that.

CJN: Would a government led by you look at helping to fund the provision of security at Jewish institutions?

Tory: I answered that question in a questionnaire during the leadership and said that every single citizen of Ontario has the right to feel secure… and I think while there's obviously some judgment involved in drawing that line – where does the government's role begin and end? – I certainly think that if there are instances in which synagogues are under surveillance or are being subject to graffiti attacks or where threats have been issued, that the public, of which the Jewish community is an integral part, has some responsibility to assist and fund the cost of addressing those issues. So I said the answer to that was a qualified "yes," qualified only by the fact that you have to set some parameters around how much security is appropriate.

CJN: You said you would scrap the [provincial] health premium. Would you replace it with anything?

Tory: I would replace it with an awful lot more money that should be coming from Ottawa. If there's a fault I find with Mr. McGuinty repeatedly, it's that he seems to be ill-equipped, if not unwilling, to go down to Ottawa and talk to his Liberal friends about doing their fair share for Ontario. [I would suggest] that there be some kind of independent body established to review the federal-provincial fiscal regime [in which] the government of Canada can accumulate a $9 billion surplus at the same time as the government of Ontario and all the other provinces are struggling just to pay the bills.

CJN: What do you see as the single biggest challenge facing Ontarians?

Tory: I think probably to maintain our prosperity. I think we lull ourselves into a false sense of self-confidence on a number of fronts, and this allows us to drift towards mediocrity. I think if let things go, we will find that all the arguments don't matter as much because there will be no money to provide adequate security or for the health care system or properly funded schools, because we will not have the prosperity we have today.

Govt. wants anti-Zionist rabbi's case reheard

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The fate of a self-styled chassidic rabbi who, because of his extreme anti-Zionist views, claims his life is in danger if he is deported to his native Israel, is now in the hands of a Federal Court judge.

The Canadian government says the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) erred in granting refugee status to Rabbi Shlomo Erez Elbarnes in October 2003, and wants his case reheard by another panel. He has been living in Ste. Agathe in the Laurentians for 4½ years, leading a community of about 30 families.

The government allowed Elbarnes' refugee claim to be heard, despite the fact that he was convicted in 1994 of kidnapping a 13-year-old boy in the United States, served two years in prison, and was deported to Israel in 2000.

Last week at a judicial review, Judge Michel Beaudry heard Justice Department lawyer Sherry Rafai Far argue that the IRB did not give enough consideration to whether Elbarnes had exhausted recourses open to him in Israel to protect him from the defamation, harassment, threats and physical attacks he allegedly suffered. Elbarnes also alleges that Israel's intelligence services were working to lay false charges against him and is afraid he may be killed in a "targeted assassination."

Rafai Far noted that Israel is a democratic country with an independent judiciary, a police review committee, and non-governmental civil rights organizations to which he could complain about persecution.

She also argued that Elbarnes' claimed fear of persecution is inconsistent with his return to Israel for three weeks in December 2001, after he settled in Canada.

She said the government is not disputing the evidence entered by Elbarnes' lawyer, Julius Grey.

That evidence is that, during the 1980s before moving to Monsey, N.Y., in 1990, Elbarnes was beaten repeatedly, received death threats and was subject to unrelenting hostility, which the authorities did nothing about. Much of the alleged abuse came from "vigilante" settlers, who are legally armed, Grey noted.

Grey said the police told Elbarnes that he was "crazy" and deserved what he was getting. Elbarnes alleges the Shin Bet, the Israeli secret service, threatened to "frame" him if he didn't get out of the country. (This testimony was given by a former agent, identified as Mr. Goldman, who is today Elbarnes' assistant.)

Moreover, Grey said Elbarnes was the target of a " hostile propaganda campaign" by the Israeli media, pointing to a March 2003 television program that suggested Elbarnes sanctioned the killing of Jews who leave their religion, when, in fact, he was stating that this biblical precept is not applicable today. Grey entered a video of the interview as proof.

Elbarnes, founder of Hisachdus Hayereim (Union of the God-Fearing), actively advocates the dismantling of the State of Israel and the land's return to Arab domination – but by peaceful means, Grey added.

Grey said countries "at war" tend to restrict liberties and take a dim view of those trying to undermine the state.

"Whether [Elbarnes'] views are right or wrong makes absolutely no difference" as to whether Elbarnes should be accepted as a refugee, Grey told the court. "The question is whether the evidence is reasonable" that Elbarnes faces the possibility of persecution in Israel.

An expert witness, Israeli lawyer Jacob Kaminsky, said it would be "suicide" for Elbarnes to stay in Israel. Another, Université de Montréal historian Yakov Rabkin, testified that, because of the ongoing conflict, Israel is more "authoritarian" and Israeli society is increasingly intolerant of anyone perceived to be playing into the hands of the enemy.

Elbarnes's brief return to Israel in 2001, Grey said, was before he made a refugee application and his experience at that time confirmed his belief he could not live in Israel.

Elbarnes, 42, was granted refugee status by IRB judge Gilles Ethier, who based his decision on documents, written testimony and the oral testimony of eight witnesses, including Elbarnes' mother, described as secular, and the abducted boy, now an adult.

Ethier wrote: "The evidence clearly shows that the claimant was persecuted for his opinions… and allows us to conclude that the alleged fear of future persecution is well founded, as the state was unable to and did not want to protect him and even contributed to defaming him as much as possible in the eyes of the public.

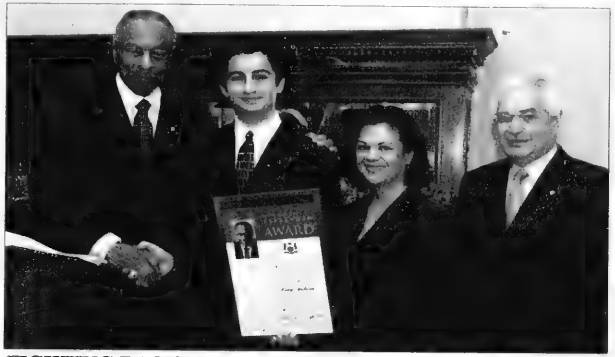
"At a time when tensions are exacerbated in Israel, I believe that the claimant would quickly be persecuted there, should he return."

Ethier cites evidence that, upon his arrival in Israel in May 2000, Elbarnes was informed by "two government agents that he was on a list of potential enemies of the state, that he had to learn a lesson from what had happened to him in the United States and that he had better keep quiet and stop spreading ideas that endangered the country's security if he did not want to end up in prison."

Elbarnes left Israel on June 20, 2000 to rejoin his family which had since resettled in Quebec. (Elbarnes has not ceased his anti-Zionist activities here; he has publicly burned the Israeli flag, given media interviews and distributed printed material.)

Elbarnes stayed in Canada on a visitor's visas that expired in March 2002. His application for residence was turned down when Canadian authorities became aware he had served time in the U.S., according to Ethier. Elbarnes then filed for refugee protection on Jan. 27, 2003.

Ethier decided not to hold Elbarnes' criminal record against him, in light of the testimony by Shai Fhima Reuven that Elbarnes did not kidnap him but was trying to help him escape an abusive stepfather and that he was grateful to him. Ethier notes that Elbarnes' sentence was reduced to two years from six by the New York Supreme Court because of what Ethier calls Elbarnes' "altruistic motivation." Beaudry said he will render judgment early in the new year.



FIGHTING RACISM: Thornhill resident Corey Shefman, second from left, was among three Toronto-area teens who received the 2004 Lincoln M. Alexander Award for youth who have shown leadership in eliminating racial discrimination. Shefman has been involved in efforts at Thornhill Secondary School to fight racism and discrimination, including playing a key role in starting Power in Diversity, an organization that raises awareness about the problem, and promotes diversity in schools and the community. In the past two years, it has raised thousands of dollars to fight racism. Seen with Shefman are, from left, former Ontario lieutenant governor Lincoln Alexander, provincial Citizenship and Immigration Minister Marie Bountrogianni and Lieut.-Gov. James Bartleman.

the act, but hopes Sirois will give a stiffer sentence. Boro said he wants to see a sentence that will "provide some protection to the community for awhile."

Defence lawyer Pierre Poupart asked for a conditional sentence served in the community. He cited the 2002 case of the firebombing of an Edmonton synagogue, in which the 20-year-old man convicted, also a first-offender, received 30 months, with parole after 10 months.

Elmerhebi, he said, has already served the equivalent of 14 months, and unlike the other man, has fully acknowledged his responsibility and the consequences, and expressed remorse.

Elmerhebi submitted a three-page apology in which he asks for the "forgiveness of the Jewish community." Other than a slight frown and occasional hanging of his head, he was impassive throughout the hearing.

UTT director-general Sidney Benudiz said he found Elmerhebi's apology "phony" and "coached." Full closure for the school will only come when an appropriate sentence is handed down, he said. "It should send a message that this type of attack on democracy is not tolerated in Canada."

Boro also doubts Elmerhebi's remorse. "He should write an op-ed article explaining why he did it, why he's sorry for his stupidity and offer to meet the Jewish community."

Poupart brought forward a series of character witnesses, including psychiatrist Dr. Louis Morissette and Elmerhebi's father Khaled to try to show that his client had acted out of character and is trying to get his life back on track by studying to be a mechanic.

Prosecution witness Janice Gerson, a UTT parent, testified on the "devastating" impact of the crime on its victims.

"I never thought this would happen in our home, in Canada," she said.

Elmerhebi's mother, Rouba Fahd-Elmerhebi, still faces a charge of being an accessory after the fact for allegedly trying to arrange for her son to leave the country after the arson.

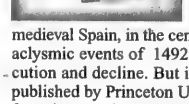
Historian explores medieval Spanish Jewry

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

With the publication of his latest book, A Jewish Renaissance in Fifteenth Century Spain, Mark Meyerson – a University of Toronto social historian – has challenged a major hypothesis of Spanish history.



Most historians claim that the Jewish experience in medieval Spain, in the century before the cataclysmic events of 1492, was one of persecution and decline. But in his newest work, published by Princeton University Press and focusing on the town of Morvedre in the kingdom of Valencia, Myerson paints quite a different picture.

As his deliberately provocative title suggests, he takes issue with the grim conventional view that Spanish Jewry in the 14th century knew nothing but gloom and despair.

As he puts it, "It's a history that has been dominated for too long by the spectre of the Spanish Inquisition and the expulsion of the Jews in 1492. Instead of simply looking back from that precipice, historians need carefully to examine Jewish life on its own terms, at the local or regional level. The results may be surprising."

And in his book, painstakingly reconstructed from a variety of archives in Madrid, Valencia and Barcelona, that is precisely what he does. Meyerson, a fellow of the University of Toronto's Centre for Medieval Studies who has long been interested in Christian-Muslim-Jewish inter-relations, uses Morvedre to prove his thesis.

Conquered from the Muslims in the 13th century, the town had the largest and most important Jewish community in Valencia after the widespread anti-Jewish disturbances of 1391.

"The long history of the Morvedre community allowed me to undertake the sort of study of a medieval Spanish Jewish community that had never been done before," he explained. "The study of a Jewish community over the course of its entire history."

One of the reasons the Jews of Morvedre prospered was because the monarchs of that period, Alfonso IV(1416-58), Juan II (1458-79) and Fernando II (1479-1516), adopted a favourable policy toward them. "They fostered Jewish settlement in Morvedre, promoted Jewish industry and commerce and considerably lightened their tax burden."

The less onerous fiscal regime had the beneficial effect of ending bitter class struggles and factionalism, he noted.

"Another key factor was the introduction of new credit mechanisms," he added. "They reshaped the kingdom's credit market and displaced the Jews as the principal purveyors of credit."

The net effect was dramatic. Affluent Christian burghers and nobles became the main creditors, lending money to Jews and investing in the public debt of the Jewish community.

As a result, public discourse and ecclesiastical agitation over the issue of "Jewish usury" ceased and relations between Jews and Christians improved markedly, said Myerson, who wrote A Jewish Renaissance in Fifteenth Century Spain in conjunction with a companion volume, Jews in an Iberian Kingdom.

A third factor was the relationship between Jews and conversos (Jews who had been forcibly converted to Christianity)."Rather than treating the conversos in isolation and viewing them as the assimilating enemies of the Jews – as do historians Benzion Netanyahu and Norman Roth – I show how Jews assisted in the Judaizing of conversos."

According to Meyerson, Jews taught conversos about Jewish law and ritual, providing them with kosher food and invited them to their homes and synagogues. Conversos thus became a focus for Jewish piety and mitzvot.

"The Jewish-converso relationship was symbiotic," said Myerson, who holds a BA from the University of Florida and post-graduate degrees from the University of Toronto. "The Jewish identity and commitment of both groups were strengthened."

Therefore, when King Ferdinand and Queen Isabel justified the expulsion of Jews on the grounds that they had subverted the Christian piety of the conversos, "they were speaking the plain truth as they understood it," he said.

Yet the flight of Jews from Spain does not diminish the evident success the Jewish community in Morvedre, and perhaps other Jewish communities, enjoyed during the preceding century, Myerson pointed out.

The status of such Jews forces scholars to reconsider their interpretation of the history of Jews in medieval Spain.

Born and raised in Miami, Myerson, 47, is currently working on a book tentatively titled Of Bloodshed and Baptism: Social Violence, Religious Conflict and the Transformation of Spain.

"It's an anthropological history of conflict and violence within Christian, Muslim and Jewish communities, as well as an analysis of Christian mob violence against Jews and Muslims. It will shed a new and different light on the religious homogenization of Spain roughly from 1300 to 1600."

Myerson's interest in medieval Spain stems from his fascination with the way in which Jews, Christians and Muslims related to each other.

Since his first visit to Spain in 1983 to research his PhD dissertation on the kingdom of Valencia, Myerson has been there around 15 times.

Spaniards are generally interested in the Jewish and Muslim presence in Spain. "It's part of Spain's more general political, economic and cultural liberalization and revitalization," he observed.

"The old debates whether the Muslims or Jews knocked Spain off its predestined 'European and Christian' course have been replaced by a real fascination in, and appreciation for, the country's Muslim and Jewish past."

Why does CBC allow violation of its own policy?

In its guidebook, Journalistic Standards and Practices, the CBC lays out three criteria that its correspondents must follow when reporting the news: "accuracy, integrity and fairness."

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

The CBC defines integrity as follows: "The information is truthful, not distorted to justify a conclusion. Broadcasters do not take advantage of their power to present a personal bias."

While most CBC reporters do their best to abide by these standards, for several years, one reporter, Neil Macdonald, has compromised the corporation's guideline on integrity by injecting his own opinions into his stories.

For example, late last month, a special UN panel issued a report defining terrorism in a way that unequivocally condemned attacks against civilian targets regardless of circumstances.

In a "Viewpoint" on cbc.ca Dec. 3, Macdonald zeroed in on one part of the report which said that a problem in defining terrorism "is that peoples under foreign occupation have a right to resistance, and a definition of terrorism should not override this right."

Macdonald freely insinuated his own highly charged take. He "explained" that what the report was discussing, "although it avoids naming names, is Israel."

Apparently dissatisfied that a UN report would "finally" take a stand that would condemn terrorism by those "resisting occupation," he added a caustic aside. "One suspects that if Texas were occupied by a foreign power, its citizens would pull out their guns and start shooting at any enemy target that presented itself, civilian or not."

He then said, "The Israeli soldiers who enforce the occupation kill a great many Palestinian civilians. If Palestinians have committed terror [Macdonald cannot bring himself to use the word "terrorism"], the Israelis have certainly committed war crimes."

Macdonald is indulging in moral equivalency of the worst sort. To equate the deliberate, premeditated murder of Israeli civilians by Palestinian groups with the IDF's accidental killing of Palestinian civilians while counteracting terrorist attacks is absurd.

But this thinking is typical of Macdonald (whose personal opinions should never have been allowed on "Viewpoint" in the first place).

One of Macdonald's favourite themes is the way Israel pulls America's strings. So it is no coincidence that in reporting from Washington, he seeks "expert opinions" to underscore this thesis.

Last May, a known pro-Arab lobby group organized a press conference where a spokesperson, Eugene Bird, implied a link between Israel and the U.S.'s mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib. Macdonald, the only journalist of any major news organization to cover the event, reported the statement. Afterwards the CBC was forced to issue a correction for the unverifiable allegation.

After a short respite, Macdonald was back to this theme. In a Nov. 21 report, he cited ex-CIA analyst and well-known Israeli critic Mike Scheuer, who has emphasized U.S. support for Israel as a major provocation for Osama bin Laden's terrorism. Macdonald complained that it is "heresy" in Washington to mention such linkage.

More recently, on Dec. 6, Macdonald interviewed another Mideast analyst, Allen Keiswetter, who also stated that the "principal" reason for Islamist terrorism is the U.S. policy towards Israel, with the United States "now regarded as being very much in the pocket of [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon."

In its Dec.16 issue, The CJN quoted Cynthia Kinch, director of programming for CBC TV News, who in a written statement, defended the inclusion of Keiswetter's remarks. "The notion that journalists should not include experts on any story is not to understand what journalism is all about," Kinch said.

Kinch entirely missed the point. The complaint about Macdonald is not that he includes expert opinions, but rather that on the issues that matter most to him, he includes only one opinion, in direct violation of CBC's commitment to integrity and fairness.

It is time for an independent inquiry into why Macdonald has been allowed to parade his personal opinions on the publicly funded CBC, in defiance of the broadcaster's own policy. This is a matter for anyone concerned about the integrity of the CBC itself.

Nfld. man held for threatening St. John's Jews

By JOEL JACOBSON
Special to the CJN

HALIFAX — Michael Paul, president of the Beth-El Synagogue in St. John's, Nfld., says he is breathing a temporary sigh of relief.

A man accused last October of uttering death threats to Paul and the Jewish population of the Newfoundland capital, and of willfully causing damage to the synagogue building, has been detained for up to a year in a mental institution after a hearing Dec. 7.

In Newfoundland provincial court on Nov. 4, Oral Crocker Vrba, 30, was found not criminally responsible for his actions because he was incapable of "appreciating the nature and quality of the acts or of knowing they were wrong," a decision by Judge David Orr stated.

Orr concluded that Vrba, diagnosed as having bipolar disorder, was mentally ill at the time he committed the offences, and remanded him to a mental institution. The Dec. 7 hearing was held to determine if Vrba was ready for release.

In a recent interview, Paul said the fact Vrba is still in hospital satisfies everyone. "By being there, he's not a danger to himself and public safety is ensured," Paul said.

The case made national headlines, and marked the first time hate crimes legislation was used in Newfoundland.

Paul said that one morning in October 2002, he opened the synagogue and saw a man standing in a hallway.

He was "a tall man, in his late 20s, I thought, and with a large needle stuck through the septum of his nose. I asked him if I could help him and he told me, 'I'm here to murder you, I'm here to finish what Hitler didn't,'" Paul said.

"He left after a few moments. I had used an alarm button to call police and when they arrived, they told me they knew of him and that he was harmless."

Several times over the next 18 months, the man appeared at the shul. He gave Paul CDs with offensive lyrics and continued to utter threats.

Last April, the police called Paul to the synagogue after arresting a man for breaking a shul window with his arm. The man, who was taken to hospital in a police vehicle, ranted to the officers how he hated all the Jews in Newfoundland and would kill them.

He was denied bail and kept in jail for the six months until his November trial.

"Since that happened, we're more anxious and careful about people we don't know coming to the synagogue,' Paul said. "We no longer have an open-door policy."

Paul said the case was an important test for hate crime laws, and the readiness of the crown attorney and police to use them.

"Both were sympathetic, and helpful and receptive to consider it," says Paul.

Paul, a nephrologist, has lived in St. John's for 22 years and has been president of the 50-member congregation since 1993. Services are held Friday nights and Saturdays and on major holidays. The shul has not had a full-time rabbi since the last one left more than 15 years ago.

PM urges MKs to back change to law on deputy PM

Coalition talks hit stumbling block

By GIDEON ALON and MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon urged Likud faction members Monday to support a Labor party bill that would change the Basic Law: The Government and allow Labor leader Shimon Peres to become a second deputy prime minister, as a condition for Labor's joining the government's coalition.

The Basic Law: The Government provides for only one deputy prime minister, a post currently held by Industry and Trade Minister Ehud Olmert. The deputy prime minister is authorized to function as acting prime minister when the premier is away or incapacitated.

The Knesset's house committee approved the draft for the amendment to the basic law Monday, thus allowing a preliminary reading of bill to be held Monday night in the Knesset. Had the committee failed to approve the bill, it would have been buried for 45 days until the Knesset constitution law and justice committee would consider it.

Sharon and Peres were also slated to meet Monday afternoon in a bid to conclude the coalition talks, which hit a stumbling block when the chair of the Knesset constitution, law and justice committee, Likud MK Michael Eitan, on Sunday refused to rush through legislation to make the change.

The Labor party wants a speedy change to the basic law, demanding that Peres be appointed acting prime minister at the same time as the party's other new ministers are sworn in this week.

But Israel Radio on Monday quoted Labor officials as saying they would also accept Peres' appointment as foreign minister or defence minister, unseating Likud members Silvan Shalom or Shaul Mofaz.

The radio said Labor central committee members were preparing to submit a proposal to a meeting of the committee on Tuesday, in which they would demand one of the three posts – deputy prime minister, foreign minister or defense minister – as a condition for the party's entry into the coalition.

"We deserve appropriate representation on the issues that concern us," Peres told reporters Sunday.

Labor leader Shimon Peres

Likud negotiators had suggested that Peres become deputy prime minister for matters related to the peace process – a position that does not currently exist, but would not require an amendment of a basic law. Labor rejected the offer, however.

Eitan said Labor rejected his offer to make Peres a minister, with the process of amending the basic law to be started at a later date.

If the basic law is amended, the change would then have to be approved by a 61-MK majority in the Knesset.

"I don't understand what can be so urgent, that it requires an amendment to a basic law. This attitude is unacceptable and I will not be a part of it," Eitan said.

"Prof. Amnon Rubinstein told me once that his biggest mistake in his political career was approving an amendment to a basic law in order to allow the extension of the number of ministers in the government. I don't want to repeat the mistake and lend my hand to such hasty legislation."

Sharon praises improved relations with Egypt

The PLO chief's initial reaction was not promising.

Asked on Al-Jazeera television about Sharon's insistence that, under any final peace accord, Israel will keep some West Bank settlement blocs and refuse to allow in Palestinian refugees, Abbas said, "This statement is totally rejected."

Though he seems certain to win the election, Abbas still is jockeying for position by trying to avoid alienating major Palestinian groups. He has called for an end to the intifadah's terrorism, saying it doesn't serve Palestinian interests, but has refused to condemn attacks on Israeli soldiers serving in the Gaza Strip.

After five Israeli soldiers were killed earlier this month in an attack on their position in Gaza, 11 were wounded last Thursday night when they were shelled with mortars.

Sharon's speech, which also praised the recent improvement in relations with Egypt, seemed designed to appeal not just to the Palestinians but to the broader Middle East.

"During 2005, we face a historic opportunity to change, from the ground up, the strategic situation of the State of Israel and take great strides towards the realization of our hopes," Sharon said.

"In order to actualize these opportunities, we must take the initiative. This is the hour, this is the time. This is the national test," Sharon said, stressing that withdrawing from Gaza – to focus on areas considered more vital to Israel, such as the West Bank settlement blocs – will unite the nation and ensure that it retains a solid Jewish majority.

The withdrawal plan "is the foundation and cornerstone for the great opportunities which lie before us, and is perhaps one of the most important decisions we have made in the last few years," Sharon said.

"Disengagement recognizes the demographic reality on the ground specifically, bravely and honestly. Of course, it is clear to everyone that we will not be in the Gaza Strip in the final agreement."

Sharon also expressed hope for closer cooperation between Israel and other nations in the fight against terrorism.

"In 2005, we have the opportunity to establish a new partnership with the international community in the struggle against terror and regional and global instability," he said. "The world, and especially Europe, has learned to understand what we have faced for many years."

Unlike in past years, when Sharon used the conference as a forum to unveil major policy initiatives, his speech this year was devoid of bold new moves. But some saw that as a sign that Israel is finally emerging from a period of intense conflict and moving ahead on the path Sharon already has set forth.

Justice ministry probing call for disobedience

By NADAV SHRAGAI AND YUVAL YOAZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Justice Ministry on Monday began an investigation into calls by prominent settler leader Pinhas Wallerstein for public disobedience during implementation of the disengagement plan, and will determine whether the Binyamin regional council head should be investigated for incitement.

Wallerstein told a meeting of the Yesha Council of Settlements on Sunday that the public should "disobey the 'transfer' law en masse, even at the price of a prison term."

Justice Ministry officials will meet Monday evening to discuss the matter, Israel Radio reported. The meeting will reportedly take place in the office of Attorney General Menachem Mazuz, who Monday urged Wallerstein to retract his comments.

"I hope that Pinhas Wallerstein will realize the weight given to things said by an elected official, and I hope that the Yesha Council will show responsibility and distance itself from these statements," Mazuz told reporters.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Monday that citizens must uphold the law despite the difficulty of the evacuation, and described Wallerstein's statements as "harsh."

Sharon also reiterated his commitment to carrying out his plan to withdraw from all 21 settlements in the Gaza Strip and four in the northern West Bank.

Meanwhile, Knesset members and the Peace Now organization urged Mazuz to launch a criminal investigation in Wallerstein's comments.

At the end of Sunday's meeting, the Yesha Council decided in principle to adopt a strategy of non-violent civil disobedience as a means of battling the evacuation of settlements under the disengagement plan, said the council's political secretary, Yehoshua Mor-Yosef.

"There is certainly a significant escalation here both in the expression and the direction and therefore we have to consider... our position opposite these unusual statements," Mor-Yosef said.

The council's decision, however, is an informal one; another meeting was to be held Monday, after which the council was to hold a press conference to announce its final decision on the issue.

"I don't fear going to prison," Wallerstein told Army Radio on Monday, "and I hope that the masses will understand, like me, that this is the price we must pay in order to non-violently disobey an immoral crime such as forcibly uprooting Jews from their homes.

"I want a large part of the public who I believe are willing to go to prison to say so today, so the decision-makers will understand where we are going... I believe that what I represent is the central line in the Yesha Council," he said.

He charged that the soon-to-be-established coalition government is "illegitimate," saying, "All the gaps between Likud and Labor are being bridged by one desire: to uproot settlements and expel Jews from their land."

"If anyone had tried to pass a transfer law like this about an Arab village, no matter how hostile, all the champions of justice and human rights would have immediately risen to protest and cried out to heaven," said Wallerstein. "But when it comes to residents of Yesha, there is no justice and no rights."

This is the first time that the Yesha Council, which represents the settlement establishment, has backed civil disobedience, though this tactic has long been advocated by other right-wing organizations, such as Zo Artzeinu and Women in Green. These organizations have spoken for years of the need to oppose any evacuation of settlements via mass civil disobedience.

"I see the comments as harsh comments," Sharon told reporters Monday. "The law must be kept.

"I understand the pain," he said. "For me also, the developments are painful, but they are necessary. I'm confident we will take all steps so the law will be kept. The disengagement will be implemented according to the schedule the government decided upon and which the Knesset approved by a large majority."

The Yesha Council's change in strategy, with which most of the speakers at Sunday's meeting agreed, comes after failed efforts to impose elections or a referendum over the disengagement plan.

"Sharon's dictatorship has pushed us into a corner," said Mor-Yosef. "We tried to be democrats, we tried to bring about elections or a referendum to determine the public's view, but Sharon decided to ride roughshod over everyone, and we will no longer play this game."

In response to Wallerstein's statements, acting Justice Minister Tzipi Livni (Likud) and MKs from Likud, Labor and Yachad called on the attorney general to launch an investigation.

Likud MK Ehud Yatom called on Wallerstein to retract his comments, saying that if he doesn't, Mazuz should check whether there has been a violation of the law.

Labor MK Ophir Pines-Paz said Wallerstein's comments constitute incitement to rebellion and said Mazuz has "no legal choice besides trying him."

Peace Now also called on Mazuz to order a criminal investigation.

However, MK Benny Elon, a former minister of the right-wing National Union party, said public leaders have the right to warn against the dangers of the disengagement plan.

Israel teams with Jewish groups to aid distressed Sudanese

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — For the first time, Israel is sending humanitarian aid to an Arab nation that it has no ties with.

The Jewish state has joined the American Jewish World Service, the Union for Reform Judaism, UJA-Federation of New York and United Jewish Communities of MetroWest, N.J., in donating $20,000 apiece for an educational project in Chad, now home to at least 200,000 refugees from Sudan.

Israel also has no ties with Sudan.

"Israel, as the Jewish state, can't sit idly by when such a humanitarian disaster is taking place," Mekel said, adding that this is only Israel's first step in offering aid to affected Sudanese.

Since last year, government-backed Arab militias have killed tens of thousands of Africans in the country's Darfur region.

The new program in Chad, set to begin Jan. 1, will be run through the International Rescue Committee and offers schooling to the children of the Kashuni camp, many of whom have been orphaned. Children comprise more than half the camp's population.

The funds will help train teachers and provide materials at several neighbouring schools to offset tension between the camp and its surrounding community.

Giving displaced Sudanese children "something of a routine and quality educational programming is really important," said Ruth Messinger, president of the American Jewish World Service.

"It is critical for the Jewish community to respond to this genocide" and to back the Jewish promise that "we would never again let the world stand silently by," she added.

When Messinger visited a camp for displaced Sudanese refugees in August, an aid worker approached her about a notebook he was keeping – packed with stories of 5,000 women who were raped in their villages.

Messinger was visiting the ironically named Abu Shock camp during a trip to Sudan to see the devastation first-hand.

"I was there," Messinger says. "I saw the level of fear and depression and the unbelievable boredom for the children who have been uprooted, frightened and now have nothing to do all day."

In addition to the deaths and countless rapes, some 1.6 million people have been displaced in the conflict that broke out in February 2003.

Some groups, like the International Rescue Committee and Doctors Without Borders, have been fundraising for distressed Sudanese already, funneling money to nonprofit groups serving some of the camps.

The Jewish Coalition for Sudan Relief, made up of 24 mostly North American Jewish groups, was created in June and has raised some $250,000.

Separately, the American Jewish World Service has raised $500,000, and the Union of Reform Judaism has raised $172,000.

"We're the community that knows better than anybody else the dangers of silence from the international community and we ought to lead the way," Messinger said.

UN set to mark 60 years since camps' liberation

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — With Kofi Annan's backing, the United Nations appears poised to host its first commemorative session on the Holocaust.

The UN secretary-general is sending letters to all member states asking for their support for a special emergency session on Jan. 24 in honour of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps.

A majority of member states, or at least 96, must answer with a letter of support for the event to take place.

Many observers expect it to happen.

"It's a no-cost opportunity," said Felice Gaer, director of the Jacob Blaustein Institute for Human Rights at the American Jewish Committee.

Countries will be able to show their opposition to genocide without having to look for balancing language on other issues, she explained.

The move comes amid a major lobbying effort led by the United States, with the backing of B'nai B'rith International.

"We believe that it is important that the United Nations, an organization that rose out of the ashes of World War II and the Holocaust, mark this important occasion in a manner fitting its historical significance," the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Danforth, wrote in a Dec. 10 letter to Annan.

Annan has lent his own outspoken support for a commemoration of the liberation.

Six months ago, the United Nations hosted its first daylong conference to address growing worldwide anti-Semitism. Annan introduced the event and spoke about the concentration camp anniversary.

"My friends, next January it will be 60 years since the first of the death camps were liberated by advancing Soviet forces. There could be no more fitting time for member states to take action on the necessity of combating anti-Semitism in all its forms," Annan said.

He referred to a recent resolution adopted by the Commission on Human Rights to protect Muslims and Arabs, asking, "Are not Jews entitled to the same degree of concern and protection?"

The special session would address the liberation anniversary with speeches. At the same time, a Holocaust exhibit, sponsored by Israel, is slated to open in UN halls on Jan. 24 and will last through early March.

Israeli soldiers get Torahs

A three-year program to deliver 100 Torahs to the Israeli army was recently completed. The program was carried out by the National Council of Young Israel, with help from El Al, Israel's national airline. Private individuals and synagogues across North America donated the Torah scrolls, which are being used by Israeli soldiers.

Israel-Egypt trade deal

Israel, Egypt and the United States signed a sweeping trade accord. Under the agreement signed in Cairo, Israel will open businesses in seven Qualified Industrial Zones in Egypt, whose products will enjoy waivers of import duties to the United States. Israel hopes the agreement, modelled on one it has with Jordan, will boost ties with Egypt.

Immigrants an asset

A new study found that recent North American immigrants to Israel are a major economic asset to the Jewish state. Each adult North American immigrant represents about $200,000 in value to the Israeli economy upon his or her arrival, according to a study commissioned by Nefesh B'Nefesh, a grassroots organization that encourages North American aliyah. The findings of the report and the announcement that almost 3,000 North American Jews immigrated to Israel in 2004 – a 20 percent increase from last year – were presented at a news conference sponsored by Nefesh B'Nefesh and the Jewish Agency for Israel, which works with the private group.

Heavenly credit

An Israeli bank plans to offer credit cards that can't be used on Shabbat. Bank Leumi said last week that the initiative was launched at the behest of Orthodox customers, but that it is not yet known when the card will officially be offered. Available under VISA and MasterCard, the card would automatically disable itself during Shabbat. Some press reports suggested it might only be usable in stores that also honour the holy day.

Brides spared lessons

Israel's chief rabbinate dropped a requirement that Jewish brides-to-be undergo lessons on "wifely behaviour." The decision to limit mandatory prenuptial classes to matters dealing directly with the religious wedding ritual was made last week after the High Court of Justice found in favour of a petition filed by the Center for Pluralistic Judaism lobby. Prompted by a television expose on rabbis who force secular prospective brides to hear lectures on how to "properly" tend to their future husbands, the petitioners argued that it was a violation of the freedom of worship.

U.S. hopes to ban Hezbollah television station

By RON KAMPEAS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A U.S. decision to place Hezbollah's TV station on a terrorism watch list could stop broadcasts of the station in the United States — but it raises questions about free speech and the murky laws governing satellite and cable broadcasting.

The State Department was set to place Al-Manar on its terrorist exclusion list by the end of last week. It would be the first such designation of a journalistic outlet. Others on the list include terror groups and banks, charities and even bakeries with ties to terror groups.

The decision was influenced by France's own move last week to ban the channel, which routinely raises money for its terrorist affiliate and broadcasts incitement and anti-Semitism.

"This is a first and important step," said David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, which has taken the lead for more than a year in urging a U.S. ban of Al-Manar.

Hezbollah is already on the State Department's foreign terrorist organization list, which is much more restrictive. It threatens criminal liability for groups that provide material support for banned organizations, and refers U.S. financial holdings to the Treasury Department's powerful Office of Foreign Assets Control.

The terrorist exclusion list, relating mostly to immigration status, carries weaker sanctions. It bans aliens working for Al-Manar from entering U.S. territory and subjects those already in the United States to deportation.

Under the exclusion list, it's not clear whether the Al-Manar bureau in Washington, D.C., would face sanctions if all its staffers are U.S. citizens.

A book on Al-Manar published recently by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Beacon of Hatred, says the station is housed in the Associated Press' Washington bureau building, and it identified the station's correspondent as Muhammad Dalbah.

Someone answering the phone at the Arabic TV section of the AP denied that, and there is no Washington telephone listing for Al-Manar.

A journalist working for another Arab TV outlet who was familiar with Al-Manar's operations confirmed Dalbah is Al-Manar's correspondent, but said he filed most reports over the phone and without pictures.

The journalist said Dalbah freelanced for Al-Manar and several other outlets and is a U.S. citizen, which likely would protect him from sanctions. Dalbah did not return calls requesting interviews.

Harris said the AJCommittee would seek further sanctions, including Treasury Department oversight and the freezing of the station's U.S. assets. Additionally, Harris said, the AJCommittee has heard from congressmen who are eager to pass laws restricting Al-Manar.

Intelsat, the Bermuda-based satellite operator that sells capacity to GlobeCast, the company that carries Al-Manar in the United States, would abide by any such laws, said spokesperson Fritz Stolzenbach.

"It goes without saying that if the U.S. federal authorities enact regulations or legislation that requires us to undertake an action along those lines, we're a company that follows the law," he said.

Stolzenbach emphasized that Intelsat was several steps removed from Al-Manar. Linking his employer to Hezbollah is like linking a company that "lays fibre in the ground" to an offensive website, he said.

A spokesperson for GlobeCast, a subsidiary of France Telecom, was unavailable.

Efforts overseas to remove the channel have been successful. An Australian satellite provider removed Al-Manar a year ago. In France, the station's repeated broadcasts of anti-Semitic material despite explicit promises to stop doing so led French authorities last week to order EutelSat – Intelsat's European equivalent – to remove the station.

But attempts to ban incitement to hatred in the United States have run up against the broad free speech protections of the First Amendment.

The AJCommittee's Harris said he anticipated free speech defences against any ban of Al-Manar, but said he was also certain that his group's decades of work defending free speech would help undercut such arguments.

Another murky area is the government's tendency to avoid regulating cable and satellite content.

"One of the things that is not regulated is which channels a cable provider carries," said Monroe Price, a communications law expert at Yeshiva University's Cardozo School of Law.

Even Al-Manar's direct appeals for funds for Hezbollah – complete with bank account information – might not be subject to U.S. regulation.

"I don't know whether there's any policing of cable channels for objectives for which money is raised," Price said. Cable and satellite providers tend to abjure themselves of any responsibility for content, he said.

Everything you need to know about chocolate

By NORENE GILLETZ

David Lebovitz is a chocolate maven. He nibbles chocolate every day – and he thinks you should, too! In his Great Book of Chocolate: The Chocolate Lover's Guide with Recipes (Ten Speed Press), Lebovitz not only writes about the history of chocolate, he also provides resources for chocolate-lovers and presents the health benefits of chocolate. This tall, slender book is even shaped like a chocolate bar!

This is the book that chocoholics have been waiting for. His third cookbook, it includes Lebovitz's personal collection of his best chocolate recipes, plus contributions from his favourite bakeries, chocolate shops, restaurants and chocolatiers. The mouthwatering recipes and pictures for Deep Dark Chocolate Truffles, Double Chocolate Souffles, White Chocolate Custard with Raspberries and Triple-Chocolate Parfait will transport you to chocolate heaven.

Lebovitz lives in San Francisco and Paris. A former Chez Panisse pastry chef, he trained at the École Lenôtre in Paris and attended Callebaut College, a chocolate school in Belgium. Visit him at www.davidlebovitz.com.

In his chocolate primer, you'll learn how to choose the best chocolate for the recipe you are preparing. He offers terrific tips for working with chocolate, including chopping, melting and tempering. You'll find out why chocolate sometimes seizes (clumps up) and what to do when it does.

Lebovitz advises: "The rule of thumb is that if you need to melt chocolate with a liquid, there should be at least 25 per cent of the liquid to the chocolate. For example, if you melt 4 ounces of chocolate, you should have at least 2 tbsp. of liquid or butter. Adding too little liquid (or even butter, which is about 20 per cent water) will likely cause the chocolate to lose its smoothness and become a granular mass."

I found Lebovitz's tips on using the right chocolate extremely helpful. Did you ever wonder what kind of cocoa or chocolate to use in a recipe? Here is the maven's advice: "Do not interchange natural cocoa powder for Dutch-process cocoa powder. Use what the recipe specifies. One is acidic and the other is alkali. If you don't have Dutch-process cocoa, chocolate guru Nick Malgieri advises adding a pinch of baking soda to the cocoa powder. Bitter chocolate is unsweetened chocolate. Bittersweet chocolate is sweetened, with added cocoa butter. Bitter and bittersweet chocolate behave very differently in recipes and are not interchangeable."

A recipe for Katharine Hepburn's brownies cropped up in Lebovitz's files when he was selecting recipes for this book. He was told that at the time she was making them, they were considered as legendary as the woman herself. Hepburn's recipe was fine as it was, but tastes have changed over the years, so Lebovitz tweaked it here and there, adding more chocolate as well as a handful of chocolate chips.

"I think she'd agree that Dave and Kate's brownies are the product of a perfect partnership," Lebovitz says.

These legendary brownies are easy to mix up with (or without) the kids over the holidays. Enjoy!

DAVE AND KATE'S REMARKABLE BROWNIES

8 tbsp. (1 stick) unsalted butter
4 oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped
1 cup sugar
2 large eggs
½ tsp. vanilla extract
6 tbsp. all-purpose flour
¼ tsp. salt
¾ cup walnuts or pecans, toasted and chopped*
½ cup semisweet chocolate chips

Butter an 8-inch square cake pan and lightly dust it with flour, tapping out any excess. Adjust the oven rack to the centre of the oven and preheat to 325.

In a medium saucepan, melt the butter. Add the chopped chocolate and stir over low heat until melted. Remove from the heat and mix in the sugar, then the eggs and vanilla.

Stir in the flour and salt, then the nuts and chocolate chips. Scrape the brownie mixture into the prepared pan and bake for 30 minutes. Remove from the oven and cool on a wire rack. Makes 16 brownies.

Note: The original recipe said to cut the cooled brownies into neat squares and eat them right out of the pan. Or store them at room temperature in an airtight container for up to 3 days.

*Toasting Nuts: Spread raw nuts on a baking sheet and toast in a preheated 350-degree oven for about 10 minutes, stirring once or twice to make sure they are browning evenly. To test doneness, snap open a nut: it should break cleanly and the inside should be lightly browned throughout. Taste a few to make sure the ones you are using are fresh tasting, as they can turn rancid easily.

* * *

Several attempts to come up with a great pudding cake made David realize that to get just the right texture, you need to bake it less than you think you do. When it's done, it will still appear quite jiggly in the centre. You'll swoon as you dive in. This dessert is a marriage of pure chocolate and coffee bliss. Serve warm, perhaps with a scoop of vanilla ice cream or a dollop of sweetened whipped cream flavoured with coffee liqueur. What a wonderful way to bring in the new year before starting on that January diet!

MOCHA PUDDING CAKE

1 cup all-purpose flour
1½ cups sugar
6 tbsp. plus ¼ cup unsweetened cocoa powder, natural or Dutch-process
1 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
2 large eggs, room temperature
2 tbsp. butter, melted
½ cup (125 ml) milk
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 cup (250 ml) hot, very strong, great-quality brewed coffee

Adjust the rack to the centre of the oven and preheat to 350. Butter an 8-inch square cake pan or a 2-quart shallow baking dish.

Sift together the flour, 1 cup of the sugar, the 6 tbsp. cocoa, baking powder and salt.

In a medium bowl, mix together the eggs, melted butter, milk and vanilla. Stir the liquid ingredients into the dry ingredients until just combined. Spread the batter into the prepared pan.

Mix together the remaining ½ cup sugar and the ¼ cup cocoa powder and sprinkle evenly over the top. Pour the hot coffee over the cake batter, then bake for 25 minutes, until it appears just set around the edges yet still slightly jiggly in the centre. Makes one 8-inch cake, 6 to 8 servings.

Carleton journalism student wins AUCC scholarship

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Alanna Petroff's first article – a piece about her father who died of cancer – was published in the Toronto Star when she was in Grade 9. Now a second-year journalism student at Carleton University, the 20-year-old Thornhill native recently received a prestigious scholarship from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

The Fairfax Financial Holdings Limited Scholarship, a renewable award that is worth $5,000 a year for three years, is one of three Petroff received to help fund her tuition and living expenses. To qualify for the Fairfax scholarship, Petroff had to write an application essay and be nominated by her school.

With a grade point average in first year of 10.4 (out of a possible 12), Petroff says she worked "ridiculously hard" last year.

Last summer, Petroff – who was featured in a CJN article last year as one of the youngest participants in the Weekend to End Breast Cancer – worked at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, writing Internet articles about Jewish neighbourhoods in Toronto.

"It was a really valuable experience, because [other journalism students] are intimidated about starting to do all their interviews, and I did so many over the summer."

Although Petroff said she "really enjoy[s]" writing, her creativity is also manifest in her artwork, some of which she has been commissioned to create.

She is pursuing a double major in art history and journalism and thinks it "would be a lot of fun to be an arts critic."

Next year, Petroff will get a taste of broadcast journalism as part of her coursework. "I'm really excited [about that]," she said.

Renowned hematologist comes to Hamilton

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Sam Schulman, a world-renowned hematologist from Sweden who specializes in treating thrombosis, has joined the Hamilton Health Sciences Centre.

"It's very challenging for me to come to Hamilton because their thrombosis research is very advanced," he says, "perhaps the most advanced site in the world."

There are many different causes for thrombosis, or blood clots, and part of Schulman's research is to find out why blood clots occur. They can develop, for example, if the person has had surgery, is immobilized for any reason, or has an underlying predisposing condition such as cancer. Although the condition is treatable, once a person has had blood clots there is a tendency for them to recur.

"What you have to do is thin the blood with medication so that it doesn't clot as easily," says Schulman. "The problem is when you thin the blood with medication to slow down the clot formation, then you also slow down clotting where you need it… for instance when you injure yourself, or if a blood vessel bursts in the brain.

"The results can be devastating. Our usual blood-thinning medication needs very close monitoring."

There are many side effects from the medication currently used, warfarin. When used to prevent blood clots from forming or growing larger, warfarin can interact negatively with about 100 different drugs, including antibiotics, cholesterol-reducing drugs or even aspirin.

Many people don't realize that alternative medicines such as ginseng or St. John's wort and certain foods may stop thinning the blood or conversely, the patient's blood can suddenly become far too thin and he or she may start bleeding.

Schulman is researching a new blood thinner called Exanta, which he says seems to be safer and seems to have fewer side effects. He notes that "it has almost no interactions with the vast majority of other medications or food." Therefore, the quality of life dramatically improves for the patient who does not have to make repeated visits to the lab to have their clotting status checked.

The American Food and Drug Administration has expressed concerns about Exanta, however, with regard to transient liver enzyme abnormalities in some patients. Exanta has not yet received formal approval in the United States, but in Europe it has been approved for patients who undergo orthopedic surgery and need protection against blood clots. It might be approved for long-term use in Europe by next summer.

"If it takes a while to get the new drug approved, then it is important to use warfarin optimally and wisely. We'll continue to work with it till we have a replacement," says Schulman.

Only in well-designed randomized studies can you tell whether the new medication is an improvement, he says.

Schulman has seen many advances in his field over the years. When he first started treating thrombosis, patients had to be admitted to a hospital and equipped with an intravenous drip of heparin for five to 10 days until the treatment with warfarin became effective, he says. When a new form of heparin was developed that could be given as an injection, patients were allowed to go home almost immediately and give themselves the necessary needle.

Although the newer medication was more expensive, it saved the patients from much longer stays in the hospital.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Which type of milk is better to give my children who are three and five years old?
A. Technically, skim milk is a great choice because it has more calcium and is lower in fat than the others, athough some fat is good for young children. The most important thing to give them is the type they will drink. I think one per cent or two per cent is best. Even chocolate milk is OK for children who refuse white milk.
Q. I can't get my daughter to eat any fruits or vegetables in her lunch at school. She is in Grade 2. I send different things every day, and they always come home untouched. What should I do?
A. First, ask her which, if any, fruits or vegetables she would be willing to eat at school. Kids have very specific ideas about what they are willing to eat, especially at school, where they sometimes avoid messy or juicy foods or those that require effort. If she tells you something that she's willing to try and it's only one thing or a short list, then simply offer this whenever possible.

Don't worry about variety. The most important thing is that it gets eaten. You obviously don't want her returning with her food uneaten. If she still refuses any fruits or veggies at school, know that you are not alone. Focus on what she is willing to eat at school so that she has food throughout the day, and offer the other foods at home instead.

Correction

The article "Experts discuss health, Botox, cosmetic procedures" (CJN, Dec. 16) contained two errors. While the Weizmann Institute has done a considerable amount of research into neurological conditions, it has not as yet done any research into the use of Botox.

In addition, Botox is not the treatment of choice for Bell's palsy; it is, in fact, contraindicated. Botox is used for such conditions as hemifacial spasm, and it is sometimes an alternative to surgery for cerebral palsy and tight leg and arm muscles in children.

A further clarification is that therapeutic doses of the drug are calculated in billionths of a gram.

The CJN regrets the errors and possible confusion.

New JVS chief psychologist stresses community involvement

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

An offer to become JVS Toronto's new chief psychologist was something Reena Kronitz could not pass up.

Throughout the 20 years she was a psychologist with the Peel District School Board, Kronitz had heard about other job opportunities, "but I was established, and comfortable with what I was doing. No other job fit like this, however.

"I was being given the chance to use my skills within the Jewish community. I knew that would work well for them and for me," says Kronitz, who has a bachelor's degree from McGill University, as well as a master's and PhD from York University.

Reena Kronitz

"Change just for the sake of change is pointless, but change within a context makes sense."

Stepping into the shoes of former chief psychologist Ruth Borchiver, who was at the agency for 40 years, Kronitz will be responsible for supervising the services provided at Jewish day schools and for the psychological work done at JVS (formerly known as the Jewish Vocational Service of Greater Toronto). She will also have some involvement in psychological evaluation.

Although she had never worked in the Jewish community, Kronitz has a long history of involvement.

Growing up in Montreal, her father Leon, who died in 1985, was executive vice-president of the Canadian Zionist Federation. He was also a longtime educator in Montreal's Jewish day school system and a leader in the Jewish community.

"As a child, I was aware of the importance of community involvement, both voluntarily and professionally. I like to think about how my father would feel about me following in his footsteps."

Since 1995, Kronitz has been on the board of directors of Bialik Hebrew Day School, where her two children were students. She is also a newly appointed member the Board of Jewish Education, and for the last year has been a member of its "Tikun Chaim" special education steering committee.

"Working in the community was not a plan, but somehow, it happened," Kronitz says.

While working at the Peel board, she says, she initiated and developed a variety of programs in collaboration with community members.

"We put together one group that looked at the needs of children who were at risk of getting in trouble. We identified the need, and then we created a proposal and got funding for a program that could give these kids support.

"Early intervention can make a big difference in a child's life."

Psychologists at the Peel board share their knowledge with school teachers, she says, and she plans to encourage that at JVS. "Our knowledge is related, but it is different. It always helps to have the benefit of a psychologist's view."

She foresees having discussions with educators in the Jewish community. "I'd like to talk about what the needs are out there, and what we can do to help.

"I believe in community partnerships. I know they work. Together, people can come up with good ideas."

In her short time at the agency, Kronitz has been impressed with her staff of psychologists. "It is a group of capable professionals who care about kids," she says.

"There are always ways to improve services, though. It is an ongoing process. Psychology is a changing and growing field. We always have to look at how we can do better."

Shylock is a complex character in Radford's film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

William Shakespeare's multilayered play turning on prejudice, romance, heartbreak, trickery and tragedy, The Merchant of Venice, has been brought to the screen by Michael Radford.

This sumptuous film, starring Al Pacino as Shylock and Jeremy Irons as Antonio, opens in Toronto next week.

As a work of art, The Merchant of Venice has always been problematic, given its demonization of Shylock, the stereotypical grasping Jewish usurer who demands his pound of flesh from his nemesis, the Christian merchant Antonio.

But in Radford's production, Shylock is portrayed not as a demon but as an aggrieved, complex character whose cruelty toward Antonio is dictated by mitigating circumstances.

In his previous dealings with Shylock, Antonio has behaved quite badly. "The villainy you teach me, I shall execute," Shylock rasps in a vengeful moment, bitter over Antonio's deep-seated anti-Semitic attitudes.

And, of course, Shylock has been devastated by the flight of his beloved daughter, Jessica, with his money in tow. She has eloped with her Christian lover, Lorenzo, and expressed a willingness to convert to Christianity.

So if you're wondering whether Radford's nuanced version of The Merchant of Venice perpetuates hateful anti-Jewish notions, perish the thought.

Experience a nine-day mission to Israel this winter

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Toronto rabbis Gary Zweig and Moshe Stern of Toronto's Kiever and Shaarei Tefillah synagogues respectively, are joining with B'nai Brith Canada to offer a multifaceted nine-day mission to Israel that combines biblical and historical sightseeing, a full roster of special events and meetings, and visits to Hebron, Gush Katif and other sites that are off the beaten path for most visitors.

The trip departs Toronto via El Al on Feb. 20, 2005, and returns March 1. The cost is $2,749 (per person, double) plus applicable taxes.

"When it came to deciding on the itinerary, all of us agreed that we wanted to visit Hebron and the Jews in Gaza," Rabbi Zweig said, explaining that Gush Katif is the Jewish community in Gaza that Prime Minister Sharon is attempting to dismantle.

"This is really a fact-finding mission. It's not political. It doesn't matter if you agree or disagree [with the government policy]. We want at least to see what is there."

Biblical and historic sites include Yad Mordechai, Tel Be'er Sheva, Jerusalem, Tel Arad and Masada near the Dead Sea. Touring in the regions of Yehuda, Shomron and Gaza will be conducted with an armoured bus and guards.

Also on the itinerary are Ashkelon, the former Philistine town connected to the story of Samson, and Gerar, located south of Ashkelon on the coastal plain.

"Gerar is mentioned in the Torah. It's a place that Abraham passed through and there's now a Jewish settlement there. Until the Jewish people came there it was kind of a wasteland, a desert. They've made it bloom in the last couple of years," Rabbi Zweig said.

Participants are due to meet with prominent Israeli decision-makers and the mayors of Jerusalem and possibly Ashkelon and Netivot, and with IDF soldiers from various faiths, including some who guard the security fence, and a group of B'nei Menashe Jews from northeastern India who are considered remnants of a lost tribe and have returned to Israel in recent years.

The itinerary also includes a Shabbat dinner in Jerusalem with the Canadian ambassador to Israel, a Saturday evening concert with some Canadians who made aliyah, a visit to the trauma unit of Shaarei Zedek Hospital where terror victims are treated, and a tour of a new branch of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum, scheduled to open in February.

"February is a great time to go because it's the low season and it's inexpensive," Rabbi Zweig said. "I invite everybody to come. I am personally responsible for everybody having a great time."

The package includes seven nights in first-class luxury hotels, most meals, land travel by air-conditioned tour bus and the services of an "exceptional" tour guide. The cost of $2,749 (per person, double occupancy) applies to all participants who pay by Jan. 12. The single supplement is $499.

For further details, please contact Pearl Gladman at 416-633-6224, ext. 108, or by e-mail at pgladman@bnaibrith.ca; or Rabbi Zweig at 416-977-3502 or reingar@pathcom.com.

Waterloo artist Paula White-Diamond is the principal illustrator of the charitable book Kisses from Above, by Susan Devenyi, written in memory of an eight-year-old girl named Victoria who died in a car crash two years ago.

"The message is how you can come through grief," White-Diamond said. "It's a grief-counselling book. It's about an angel who tells a family that even though she's gone away, her spirit is still with them every day."

Eight friends of Victoria's parents also contributed drawings of angels to the book, which is available at the Gallery on the Grand in Waterloo and at Angel Treasures bookstore in St. Jacob's, Ont. It may also be ordered by e-mailing mdpmartha@rogers.com or through the website paulawhitediamond.com. Proceeds go to a children's fund in Victoria's name.

'Suffrance is the baggage of our tribe'

Radford has clearly bent over backwards to clear the air and present Shylock as a truly tragic but calculating figure trapped by the anti-Semitism of 16th-century Europe and enmeshed in a catch-22 situation of his own making.

In a prologue that establishes the incendiary racial climate of the day, viewers are reminded that Jews in the mercantile city state of Venice were outside the boundary of its liberal ethos and subjected to the whims of intolerance.

Forced to live in a ghetto and wear red hats to distinguish them from their Christian neighbours, Jews were second-class citizens, always unsure of their personal security and physical safety.

This unsettling uncertainty emerges in the first few scenes as Jews are capriciously tossed off a bridge and as Antonio, in a blatant sign of contempt, spits in Shylock's face. "Suffrance is the baggage of our tribe," Shylock sighs in a world-weary aside.

Thanks to Radford's skills as a director and screenwriter, The Merchant of Venice is a work of seamless magic and mounting tension.

But in his greatest achievement, Radford makes this signature Shakespearean play accessible and compelling to a wider audience.

In unobtrusive fashion, he has updated Shakespeare's archaic, albeit transcendent, language and endowed it with a patina of modern currency. Even viewers who have been chary of Shakespeare will probably connect with his free-flowing dialogue.

Impressive as well are the sets (particularly a canal glowing orange at night) and the costumes. They set the mood and give the film its verisimilitude.

Radford coaxes admirable performances from his ensemble. Pacino, the centre of gravity in this intoxicating film, is a standout. But Irons and Collins are no less riveting.

Cello-guitar duo blend their music – and their lives

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

If music be the food of love, Daniel and Carey Domb are sharing a feast with their audiences. The cello-guitar duo creates the perfect blend of give and take in their music, and in their life together.

The Dombs will be performing their popular children's program, Pictures in Music, at First Night Toronto, a family-oriented alcohol-free year-end celebration from Dec. 29 to 31.

In its 14th year, at its new venue, the Distillery Historic District, Toronto joins 200 city events worldwide hosting an all-ages community festival featuring a broad spectrum of arts and performances.

Described as the themes from The Simpsons and The Pink Panther with a little Beethoven tucked in the middle, Pictures in Music introduces classical music to children in a fun environment. Between musical selections, they learn about the cello and guitar, with an opportunity for lots of audience participation. "And of course," says Carey, "we include music that their parents enjoy as well."

Daniel and Carey Domb: Easy on the senses.

Married for 15 years, the Dombs share their north Toronto home with four feline family members, who, Daniel tells me, "really like Bach."

"From the time we met, we found we had so much in common, including our music," says Daniel. "I could start playing a melodic line at any time and Carey was right there to work in her part beside me."

After many years of performing with orchestras, the couple discovered that they preferred playing exclusively together, for smaller, more intimate groups. "As a musician in a large orchestra, you don't really get a chance to exercise your creative side," Carey says.

Daniel's career began at 15, when he was chosen by Leonard Bernstein to play with the New York Philharmonic Young People's Concerts. He graduated from Juilliard with a master's degree in music, and performed as a soloist with with the Chicago Symphony, the Boston Pops, the National Symphony, Saint Louis Symphony and Cleveland Orchestra, later joining the latter as principal cellist for two years. Domb left his most recent position, principal cellist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, in 2001, after 27 years.

Daniel and Carey Domb perform at First Night Toronto.

Carey, also a cellist, performed with the Houston Pops Orchestra, Mantovani Orchestra, CJRT Orchestra, Toronto Philharmonic and Canada Pops Orchestra after graduating with a master's degree in music from Rice University, in Texas.

She began experimenting with the guitar about 10 years ago. "We decided to combine my guitar with Daniel's cello in our performances because the two instruments complement each other so well and create a slightly different experience," she said.

Their instrumental fusion is easy on the senses and, at the same time, compelling. The cello, in the same register as the human voice, evokes emotional response, tempered by the lighter effect of the guitar.

"Now we are doing exactly what we always wanted to do," Daniel says. "Playing great music that we love and that the audience loves. We choose music that speaks to people – light classics and a lot from our Jewish traditions. Music is very much a give and take situation. We're not just performing for people – it's really an exchange."

You can feel the free flow of artistic energy as they discuss their salon performances in private homes and the interactive educational programs they bring into the primary schools.

The Dombs first performed at First Night Toronto in 2000, and are looking forward to being part of the festival again this year. "It's exciting that after the performance the family goes home together, talking about the music," says Daniel. "Experiencing music is a way for them to communicate, just like having dinner together."

Daniel and Carey have recorded four CDs together under their own label, North Star Records. Apollo and Odyssey are recordings of light classics and Il Sole Italiano is a collection of romantic Italian pieces. Their latest release, Steppes, is a compilation of Jewish, Russian, Polish, Ukranian and Rumanian music that Daniel grew up with. He says, "This music is really in our souls."

"When we started recording Steppes, we had intended to do the same kind of CD as the others," says Carey, "but somehow it just wasn't happening. We thought let's play something freilech, and from then there was no turning back."

The Dombs are in sync as always, going forward and spreading joy to the world through the universal language of music.

"Music is in all of us to enjoy. It's a gift from God," Daniel says.

The Tree of Life: a monumental novel of the Lodz Ghetto

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

F. Scott Fitzgerald famously wrote that there are no second acts in American life. But there is a more appropriate use for his phrase. There are no second acts in Yiddish literature.

The world that nurtured its writers was largely obliterated in Nazi Europe, and what remained after the war, in centres such as Manhattan, Montreal and Buenos Aires, faltered and faded during the postwar decades.

Norman Ravvin

The prominence of Isaac Bashevis Singer – confirmed by his Nobel Prize for literature – was so rare a phenomenon that other major postwar Yiddish writers (and the odd writer's widow), mired in regret and resentment, expended valuable energy arguing over whether Singer was the right representative of their gutted tradition.

Another rare exception to the rule is the resurgence of Chava Rosenfarb's career. Rosenfarb came to Montreal in 1950 as part of the large contingent of Holocaust survivors who were allowed into the country as part of a face-saving coda to Canada's notorious rejection of Jewish refugees from 1933 to 1948.

She lived and wrote in Montreal for nearly 50 years, where she was an important figure in the influential coterie of Yiddish writers, educators and intellectual idealists who contributed to the city's unusual Jewish cultural milieu. Rosenfarb, who now lives in Lethbridge, spoke lovingly of these early years in Canada in a recent talk given at Concordia University.

"I could count more than 40 Yiddish writers living in Canada in the years just after my arrival in this country, writers of international reputation and recognized all over the Yiddish-speaking world," she said. "There was an active writers' union in Montreal, which I was invited to join. There were constant public lectures on literary topics. There were visits by the great Yiddish writers from abroad."

But Rosenfarb's fiction also reflects the difficulties of maintaining a writing life alongside family responsibilities, and she writes as well, in a novelistic story titled Edgia's Revenge, of the claustrophobic, troubled community inhabited by survivors in Montreal. In a recently published collection called, simply, Survivors, she reflects on her compatriots' inability to extricate themselves from the suffering of their past.

More recently, the University of Wisconsin Press has brought out a newly reprinted edition of Rosenfarb's monumental novel of the Lodz Ghetto, The Tree of Life.

Published first in English translation in Melbourne in 1985, The Tree of Life will appear in three volumes, the first of which, dealing with the lead-up to and the year 1939, is available under the subtitle On the Brink of the Precipice, 1939.

The Tree of Life is a remarkable historical document and an excellent read. The Lodz Ghetto, like the Warsaw Ghetto and the better-documented death camps, has gained the status of a symbolic site – a human landscape transformed into a particularly German landscape of Jewish suffering and death.

The ghetto was planned early in the war and lasted longer than any other, though it was never as large as the Warsaw Ghetto. Its long existence makes the examination of its society, leadership, and the German treatment of its inmates a particularly revealing case study. Rosenfarb begins with a portrait of prewar Lodz – from its Jewish inhabitants from the wealthy merchant and manufacturing class to the often leftist-inclined working poor. And she portrays the early stages of what historians call the "machinery of destruction," as German edicts rob Jewish Lodzers of all they possess.

The novel provides a fascinating portrait of the man who would become what the Germans called the Alteste der Juden (The Elder of the Jews), Mordecai Chaim Rumkowski, the Nazi-appointed ghetto administrator.

Rosenfarb writes as if she knew Rumkowski, but more likely she simply encountered many people with detailed knowledge of his behaviour. So, Rosenfarb's fictional portrait must be consulted alongside that which appears in Saul Bellow's Mr. Sammler's Planet and Primo Levi's The Drowned and the Saved, as well as in the well-documented volume and video that appeared under the title Lodz Ghetto.

In this way, Rosenfarb's portrayal of Rumkowski's own brand of messianic madness and melancholy sentiment complements the quantity of historical documentation that was preserved by the energetic self-appointed archivists who worked in the ghetto to preserve its memory in diary, historiography and pictorial art.

There are other important fictional re-enactments of actual historical characters in the volumes yet to appear. And readers will do well to follow their publication.

The second act of Chava Rosenfarb's long, successful career in Yiddish is being played out in English. Her youth following the war, her longevity, her energy in later life when most of us turn to gardening and complaining, are all contributors to this development.

Crucial, too, is Rosenfarb's intimate working relationship with her daughter, Goldie Morgentaler, who acts as an able co-translator and literary help-mate to her mother. Alongside these factors is the willingness on the part of some publishers to dedicate resources to recovering a wealth of Yiddish writing that was largely ignored, even rejected after the war. It is we, the readers, who profit from this confluence of circumstance and hard work.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He co-edited The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and chairs the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

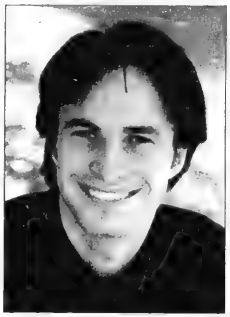
Toronto writer's play debuts in New York

By SCOTT DREVNIG
Special to the CJN

NEW YORK — There was an influx of Canadians to New York recently – no, not for last-minute Chanukah shopping but for the local premiere of Toronto playwright Daniel Goldfarb's new comedy Modern Orthodox.

With an all-star cast featuring Craig Bierko, Molly Ringwald and Jason Biggs, the play is Goldfarb's first open-ended commercial production of his New York career.

It is a memorable and hysterical romantic comedy about love, dating and unlikely friendships. A financial consultant (Bierko), his doctor girlfriend (Ringwald) and a Jewish diamond dealer (Biggs) explore how faith can still be relevant in the fast-paced world of New York City.



Daniel Goldfarb

Goldfarb, 31, grew up with a Woody Allen vision of New York so he was quite surprised to find what New York was really like.

"It's very tight here, more assimilated," he says The comedy is actually "very Toronto" but Williamsburg in Brooklyn has been substituted in place of Toronto's Bathurst Street. He describes opening night as "the biggest night of his career"

Goldfarb grew up in a fairly Reform close knit family in Toronto, hence the influx for opening night. He has three sisters and many nieces and nephews so he visits Toronto often from his adopted home of New York.

Goldfarb graduated from Earl Haig's drama program and moved to New York 12 years ago where he completed his BFA and MFA degrees at The Juilliard School and NYU. He's now a teacher at NYU and has a Canadian fiance in graduate school so they hope their academic schedules will allow for summers spent at home in Toronto.

Biggs, famous for his role in the American Pie movies and who shares the same representation as Goldfarb came to New York to do a reading of the play and was rewarded with the part as "lovable schmuck" Hershel Klein.

The play deals with the effects Biggs' character has on a young Jewish couple of lapsed faith. His prejudices against his "ersatz" Jewish hosts highlight the conflict between the religious and the secular.

Bierko, who just finished filming Cinderella Man in Toronto with Russell Crowe, plays Ben Jacobson, a successful Upper West Sider who is ready to get married to smart, vulnerable Hannah Ziggelstein, played surprisingly well by Ringwald (best known for such films as Pretty in Pink and Sixteen Candles). Ben's opinion of the Orthodox mindset is one of being distant, old world, and incredibly sexist – and there are a lot of Bens out there with the same thoughts. Ben has no problem using words like "kike" to describe fellow Jews, especially the deeply neurotic Orthodox diamond salesman he has just met.

Jenn Harris and Jason Biggs in Modern Orthodox.

Goldfarb, who's having a traditional Jewish wedding soon in Toronto, feels that some of the spirituality he needs comes from being an artist, "creating something when nothing is there." In many ways, the play is about the comfort that comes from faith and spirituality. "Yoga studios are full, meditation is prevalent – people are looking for something," Goldfarb says

The play covers some of the most pertinent and controversial issues facing the Jewish community today. In many ways it helps bring Jews together by providing some much needed understanding and laughter between the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform communities. If Jewish movements don't understand each other – how can we expect the world to understand us?

By the end of the play, Ben and Hannah get to a deeper place in their relationship because of their encounter with Hershel.

"It's about being the other and being the same."

Goldfarb wrote Adam Baum and the Jew Movie (2003 Canadian Authors Association Award for Best Play, 2000 NY Newsday Oppenheimer Award) and Sarah, Sarah which was presented recently in Manhattan and takes place in Toronto.

He wrote Modern Orthodox about five years ago when he was at Juilliard. He took a class in which he was asked to write about a topic "that's fascinating to you, but boring to write about." He started writing about the feelings and differences between secular and religious Jews.

In the play, "all of the darkness happens in the first part of the play, then a journey towards hope and optimism begins," Goldfarb says. He hopes to bring this play and Sarah Sarah to Toronto soon

It has been optioned by Bob Balaban's Chicago Films, so one way or another, many will have a chance to take a look at a refreshing new play that offers hope, reconciliation and understanding.

Modern Orthodox is directed by director James Lapine, whose usual collaborators include Steven Sondheim. It's on an indefinite run at a new off-Broadway theatre called Dodger Stages 340 West 50th Street,New York. 646-871-1730. For tickets www.telecharge.com; or call 212-239-6200.

Israeli hockey player skating at Notre Dame

Even though he's still recovering from his injury, he's loving it. The people in Saskatchewan have been really great, he's made friends with guys on his team, and he gets to play the game he loves.

It's been Zamir's dream for years to devote himself to his favourite sport. He's always loved the speed, teamwork and skill associated with hockey, but in Israel, his ice time was limited, as was the chance to improve his game.

Then last summer, while attending the hockey school established by the late Roger Neilson at Metulla's Canada Centre, he met Jean Perron, the former bench boss of the Montreal Canadiens. Perron, who was heading up the hockey school, saw something special in Zamir and pulled him aside after a practice. They talked about Zamir's hockey future and what he heard surprised him and got him thinking.

How would he like to play hockey in Canada while continuing his education at Notre Dame? Perron asked.

Zamir was taken aback by the offer, but it appeared to be the answer to his dreams.

Happily, his family agreed.

"I think I'm really lucky to be part of that family," he said. "They're supporting me in every way. They wanted to help me make my dream come true."

What followed was "a crazy week" of last-minute arrangements and packing. By Sept. 3, Zamir was in Wilcox. He had been offered the opportunity on Aug. 15.

Perron liked what he saw in Zamir and he wanted to help him pursue his dream. "I always felt Notre Dame College was the best place for education and hockey at the same time," Perron told The CJN.

"The kid has, for me, good potential. He's a bright student… and he's a leader too."

One of the first items on Zamir's agenda once he arrived in Wilcox was tryouts.

"When I came here in the first week, it was so difficult for me," he said.

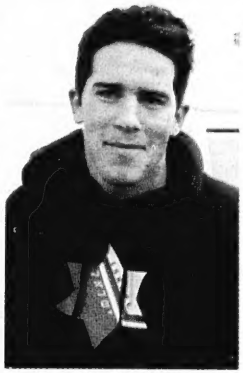
Growing up in Metulla, Zamir had watched only a handful of NHL games on TV, and important elements of the sport, like positional play and ebb and flow, were new to him.

When his coach at his first practice told him to play in a defensive box, Zamir had no idea what he was talking about.

"For sure it's a huge difference," he said. "When I came here, I knew it would be difficult. But I wanted to come here and take the chance."

Although he didn't make the school's junior team, Zamir was good enough for a spot on a team that plays good calibre hockey.

"It's awesome," he said. "The players are so good."



Oren Zamir

Blessed with a five-foot-10, 197-pound frame and good balance on his skates, Zamir said he must improve his puck handling and positional play.

Dale Derkatch, director of hockey development at Notre Dame, agrees that Zamir brings several strengths to his team, especially his competitive spirit.

Zamir plays at a decent level, and considering the major change in his life – moving away from his family, living in a dorm – he's adjusted pretty well, Derkatch said.

Zamir has shown impressive maturity for his age, he continued. "It was really nice that kids come from such a long way and they're so grown up and mature." Sometimes, students from overseas adjust to the residential school better than Canadian youngsters who are only a short distance from home, he added.

Perron echoes those sentiments. He too is impressed by Zamir's demeanor. "He's more mature than his age," he said. "You can see he's got vision about himself and Israeli hockey."

Perron and Zamir talk on the phone once a week, "about everything," Perron said. He believes the atmosphere at Notre Dame, where life consists of studying and hockey, is conducive to producing young people prepared for anything life throws at them.

Derkatch, who played under Perron at the 1983 World Junior Championships, said the school, though "Roman Catholic at heart," does not force that religion onto its students. "We want people to recognize God for about one hour a week." Zamir was free to do so as he saw fit, and Derkatch noted Zamir had arranged to attend synagogue services.

As for Zamir, he's beginning to feel more comfortable in his new home and he's even managed to disabuse his classmates about their misconceptions of life in Israel.

"At the beginning, they were asking ridiculous questions: did we ride camels, is it all desert, do we have cars?" he recalled. "After a while, they know we live in the same world."

Zamir is expecting time off around Christmas and he'll fly back to Israel to visit his family. Chances are it will be chilly when he arrives, but a far cry from that "dry cold" they have back in Saskatchewan.

Beliveau praises Maccabi Canada for supporting all qualified athletes

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hockey great Jean Beliveau showered praise on the Maccabi Canada organization for commiting to allow every athlete who qualifies for the team to go to the 12th Maccabiah Games in July 2005, regardless of ability to pay.

The occasion was a recent fund-raising "petit souper" in Grover Auditorium of the YM-YWHA Ben Weider JCC.

In 1985, he was honorary "chef de mission" of the Canadian team. In 1996, Maccabi Canada feted Beliveau with a tribute dinner. In 1997, the year of the tragic bridge collapse leading into Ramat Gan Stadium, Beliveau led the Canadian team again.

So Beliveau said he didn't think twice before accepting an invitation by Maccabi Canada stalwarts Gary Ulrich and Roy Salomon to speak at the Y on behalf of an organization he has come to hold dear.

"It didn't take me long to accept, that's for sure," Beliveau told the scores in attendance, among them Senator Leo Kolber, Keren Hayesod Board of Trustees chair Harvey Wolfe, FEDERATION CJA president Sylvain Abitbol, Y president Rickey Blatt and Ariela Cotler, representing her parliamentary spouse, Irwin.

As Ulrich noted, the timing was just right. Staging the event a day before the first Chanukah candle lent the appropriate symbolism: Judah Maccabee embodying the ideals of strength and dignity that define the Maccabi movement.

For Beliveau, though, the organization has also symbolized the power of a people united in spirit and purpose.

"I remember it so well," he said in a brief interview. "Those experiences of 1985 and 1997 were so great. I was involved in many Stanley Cups, but I'll never forget the feeling of walking into Ramat Gan stadium in front of 50,000, 60,000 people."

The audience laughed when Beliveau said that while he had been involved in "some" Stanley Cups, he rued never having had the chance to play hockey at the Olympics.

"I will never forget, talking to the athletes [in Israel], how enthused they were and how honoured they felt," he recalled.

"What you are doing tonight is supporting those who don't have the means."

Indeed, as envelopes were distributed for donations to the Maccabiah Athletes Assistance Fund, what seemed obvious was the challenge to be faced by the organization as the weeks and months count down to July 11.

At $6,000 per athlete, the total cost of sending a team of several hundred is staggering. While athletes have for years been called upon to help raise funds on their own behalf, Maccabi Canada has never wanted the situation to become one of "not quite the best-qualified-athlete who can afford to pay" versus "the better-qualified athlete who can't."

That's why the organization is determined to raise enough money so that the burden on the athletes won't be so onerous. That will be done through events and individual and corporate approaches. The organization recently held another successful fundraiser, the Mike Yuval Tennis Tournament on Nun's Island.

Leyla Di Cori, a fencer and 1993 Maccabiah Games veteran, recalled how "extremely emotional" the experience of competing at the Games was. "It was my first time there, but it felt like home," she said. "You have to participate to know what the Maccabi spirit is all about."

Salomon, who has long been known as "Mr. Maccabi" for his decades of devoted involvement – despite no longer holding the presidential reins – underscored the long-standing ties between the Y and Maccabi Canada and remembered how the Jewish spirit was rekindled within him at the Games he first witnessed in 1969.

Salomon remembered the ambivalence about going amid the terror of 2001, but also the glory of singing Hatikvah in Teddy Kollek Stadium after the team ultimately did go. He remembered Maccabi Canada stalwarts like the Luxenberg family. He remembered the late Gordie Schwartz, and the way so many community leaders got their first true sense of Jewish pride and affiliation competing at the Games or volunteering within the movement.

Ulrich pointed out that playing basketball [as Salomon also did], "inspired my love for the Jewish community."

For him, helping to send athletes to Israel by giving money is an investment in the Jewish community and future that will pay off for generations. "Our motto now is not to leave any qualified athlete behind," Ulrich said.

"התדע מאין נחלתי את שירי?" שאל פעם ביאליק בפתח לשיר שכתב. וכאן, חמישה-עשר משוררים וסופרים מן השורה הראשונה שונים לשאלה זו ומנסים להסביר את מקורות ההשראה הספרותיים והאישיים שלהם. המסות משרטטות חוויות תרבותיות עשירות והתהוות מרתקת של היצירה הישראלית. פרופסור רות קרטון-כלום, עורכת הקובץ משמשת ראש החוג לספרות עברית באוניברסיטה העברית, ירושלים.

סוגיית הזיכרון משחקת תפקיד מרכזי בהתהוות ההשראה הספרותית. מה זוכרים הסופרים ומה הם מסיקים מהזיכרון לגבי צורות וחכני הבעתם. "מתי התחלתי לאהוב ספרים", שואלת רות אלמוג והאם "דפי הזיכרון האישי-משפחתי והספרותי מתערבבים אלו באלו?"

Money Matters

Tax planning and Torah values

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

As we approach the end of the year, we are bombarded with article after article explaining how a little year-end planning can help us keep more of our money away from the taxman. While there is nothing unethical about limiting our individual tax burden, the constant search by tax professionals for sophisticated legal arrangements to circumvent the intent of the law runs the risk of sliding down a slippery moral slope. Democracies function through the voluntary payment for services by its citizens, services that can only be funded by tax dollars. It would not even be a stretch to state that taxes could be considered a form of tzedakah, enabling public services to be provided.

Of course, just as every tzedakah organization must be held accountable, so too governments must not misuse our funds. Strange as it may sound, paying your fair share of the tax burden is to be considered a mitzvah. And like all mitzvot, we should not try to avoid performing them. Of course the feeling of being forced to "donate" to the government coffers naturally causes feeling of resentment, whereas with our private tzedakah, the ability to choose where and how much to give provides us with a sense of deep satisfaction.

Attitude is crucial in developing an ethically refined personality. While the Torah tells us "if you lend money" (Exodus 22:24), our sages note that the word "if" in our verse really means "when," as those who have the financial means are obligated to lend money to those in need. Yet if the Torah means "when" why does it say "if"? The Maharal of Prague explains that the Torah wants to teach us that we should fulfill our obligations with the enthusiasm and fervour of a volunteer. They should not be a burden but a pleasure. And nowhere is this more important that in fulfilling our financial responsibilities.

The biblical command to "do what is fair and good" (Dvarim 6:18) instructs us to act beyond the letter of the law in our monetary dealings. We must at times be willing to give up that which is legally ours in order to foster a "kinder, gentler" society. By focusing on the sprit of the law, even if it means a few less dollars in our pockets, we are fulfilling the mitzvah of kedoshim tehiyu, (Leviticus 19:1) "be holy for I, your Lord am holy."

Wishing on the candles of 2005

URBAN WRITER

In 2005, how superb it would be if the soul and unity of the Toronto Jewish community burst out all over the place. Here are some ideas.

Wouldn't it be great if we liberated ourselves from some of the stodginess of past decades that has compelled us to look down on public debate and divergent opinions? Instead, we should let our communal hair down by pursuing a risky, confident and wildly outward proliferation of Jewish cultural programming and learning, and a progressive, hands-on relationship with Israel and the world at large.

In 2005, the Toronto Jewish community could do this by launching more Jewish newspapers and journals – be they right-leaning, left-leaning or centrist – as well as Jewish art galleries and exhibits of creativity in all its forms. We should revisit, in a progressive manner, the age-old Jewish tradition of the exhaustive pursuit of truth through the spoken and written words.

If the chance arises in the coming year, our community should also submit an application to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission for a Jewish radio station. Toronto's Greek community – which is half our size – has had a radio station since 1969, and last year, Toronto's tiny Latin American community secured its own spot on the dial.

Imagine the potential of 24-hour Jewish broadcasting. Imagine the fun we could have, the things we could learn and the thrill of being able to express our own opinions about Israel and Judaism to the world, rather than hearing the often loquacious and vituperative musings of unresearched journalists. And what a smart way to fight anti-Semitism.

In 2005, we need to launch a comprehensive home visitation program for our seniors, many of whom have only a walk to the drug store to look forward to. There are aging donors who would fund a friendship initiative that would show respect for the people who laboured, with gutsy character and heart, to build and maintain the Toronto Jewish community. What a mitzvah!

According to a recent national demographic study undertaken for UIA Federations Canada, the 15 to 24 age group in our community has grown by more than 20 per cent since 1991.

Listen closely to the voices on the street and you'll hear that many of those young people looking for a fun, inventive and socially aware place to interact with other Jews. Despite this, we are one of the only major Jewish communities not to have a youth drop-in centre. We need one.

Such a centre would have to be hip, compelling, appealing and exciting. It could have a nightly music café, as well as exhibits featuring the work of some of our brilliant artistic talents. It could also host controversial debates, clubs and classes on issues related to Israel, Torah and Judaism in general.

It would have to be centrally located and fully funded. A Jewish drop-in centre would encourage more interaction between high school graduates, university students and newcomers to the working world, and it would provide a much-needed place for Jewish singles to meet each other. A drop-in centre is the right of our Jewish youth.

In 2005, let's consider adjusting, ever so slightly, our Canadian humility. Let's tweak it with some American ego and a little African soul, as well as the Israeli ability to have a really great time, so that we can celebrate the beauty of our Jewish community, which is now among the 10 largest in the world.

For 2005, I blow out the New Year's candles and wish for a year of gigantic spirit, bold Jewish neshama (soul), and an embrace of our Jewish way like never before.
